Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

Minneapolis has held an indignation meeting denouncing the accusation as a plot of St. Paul's. In any event, Minneapolis will hav a new count.

Gems of Thought.

THE man who with realizing earnestness believes the doctrin of exclusiv salvation, will habitually place the dogmatic above the moral element of religion; he will justify, or at least very slightly condemn, pious frauds or other immoral acts that support his doctrins; he will judge men mainly according to their opinions, and not according to their acts; he will lay greater stress on those duties that grow out of an ecclesiastical system, than on those which grow out of the moral nature of mankind; he will obtain the certainty that is necessary to his peace by excluding every argument that is adverse to his belief; and he will above all manifest a constant tendency to persecution. On the other hand, men who hav been deeply imbued with the spirit of earnest and impartial inquiry, will invariably come to value such a disposition more than any particular doctrins to which it may lead them; they will deny the necessity of correct opinions; they will place the moral far above the dogmatic side of their faith; they will giv free scope to every criticism that restricts their belief; and they will value men according to their acts, and not at all according to their opinions. The first of these tendencies is essentially Roman Catholic. The second is essentially Rationalistic.—Lecky.

THE majority of Christians believe in making the best of both worlds, though any candid reader of the New Testament must see that they are a different order of Christians from the original sect, and hav virtually evolved a new religion to suit the times. The apostles and early Christians were looking for the speedy return of Christ, and therefore taught contempt of the world. A good old man, who spent his days in prayer and tract distribution, was admiring the noble ship in which I was about to embark on a voyage around the world. "Yes," I said, "we hope to hav some good times in her." "Ah, my dear brother," said he, "we can't take any pleasure in this world that has crucified our Lord." His view of life was similar to that of the "dear brother" who shut his eyes in the cars, lest the beauties of this world should distract his thoughts from Christ and the age to come. They considered inventions and arts as man's effort to improve what God had condemned. Though Christians generally may now disavow these pietistic views, they cannot deny their scripturalness; and consistency should lead them to follow them, or else admit that the New Testament is not their infallible guide. These views of the future life, as being so immeasurably the object of our concern, discourage efforts for the increase of knowledge and invention or the improvement of the material condition of man, the saving of his soul being all that is worth attention, since the world and all in it is to be burnt up.—R. C. Adams.

SPIRIT sublime! Thou gav'st me, gav'st me all
For which I prayed! Not vainly hast thou turn'd
To me thy countenance in flaming fire:
Gavest me glorious nature for my realm,
And also power to feel her and enjoy;
Not merely with a cold and wondering glance,
Thou dost permit me in her depths profound,
As in the bosom of a friend to gaze.
Before me thou dost lead her living tribes,
And dost in silent grove, in air and stream
Teach me to know my kindred. And when roars
The howling storm-blast through the groaning wood,
Wrenching the giant pine, which in its fall
Crashing sweeps down its neighbor trunks and boughs,
While with the hollow noise the hill resounds:
Then thou dost lead me to some sheltered cave,
Dost there reveal me to myself, and show
Of my own bosom the mysterious depths.
And when with soothing beam, the moon's pale orb
Full in my view climbs up the pathless sky,
From crag and dewy grove, the silvery forms
Of by-gone ages hover, and assuage
The joy austere of contemplativ thought

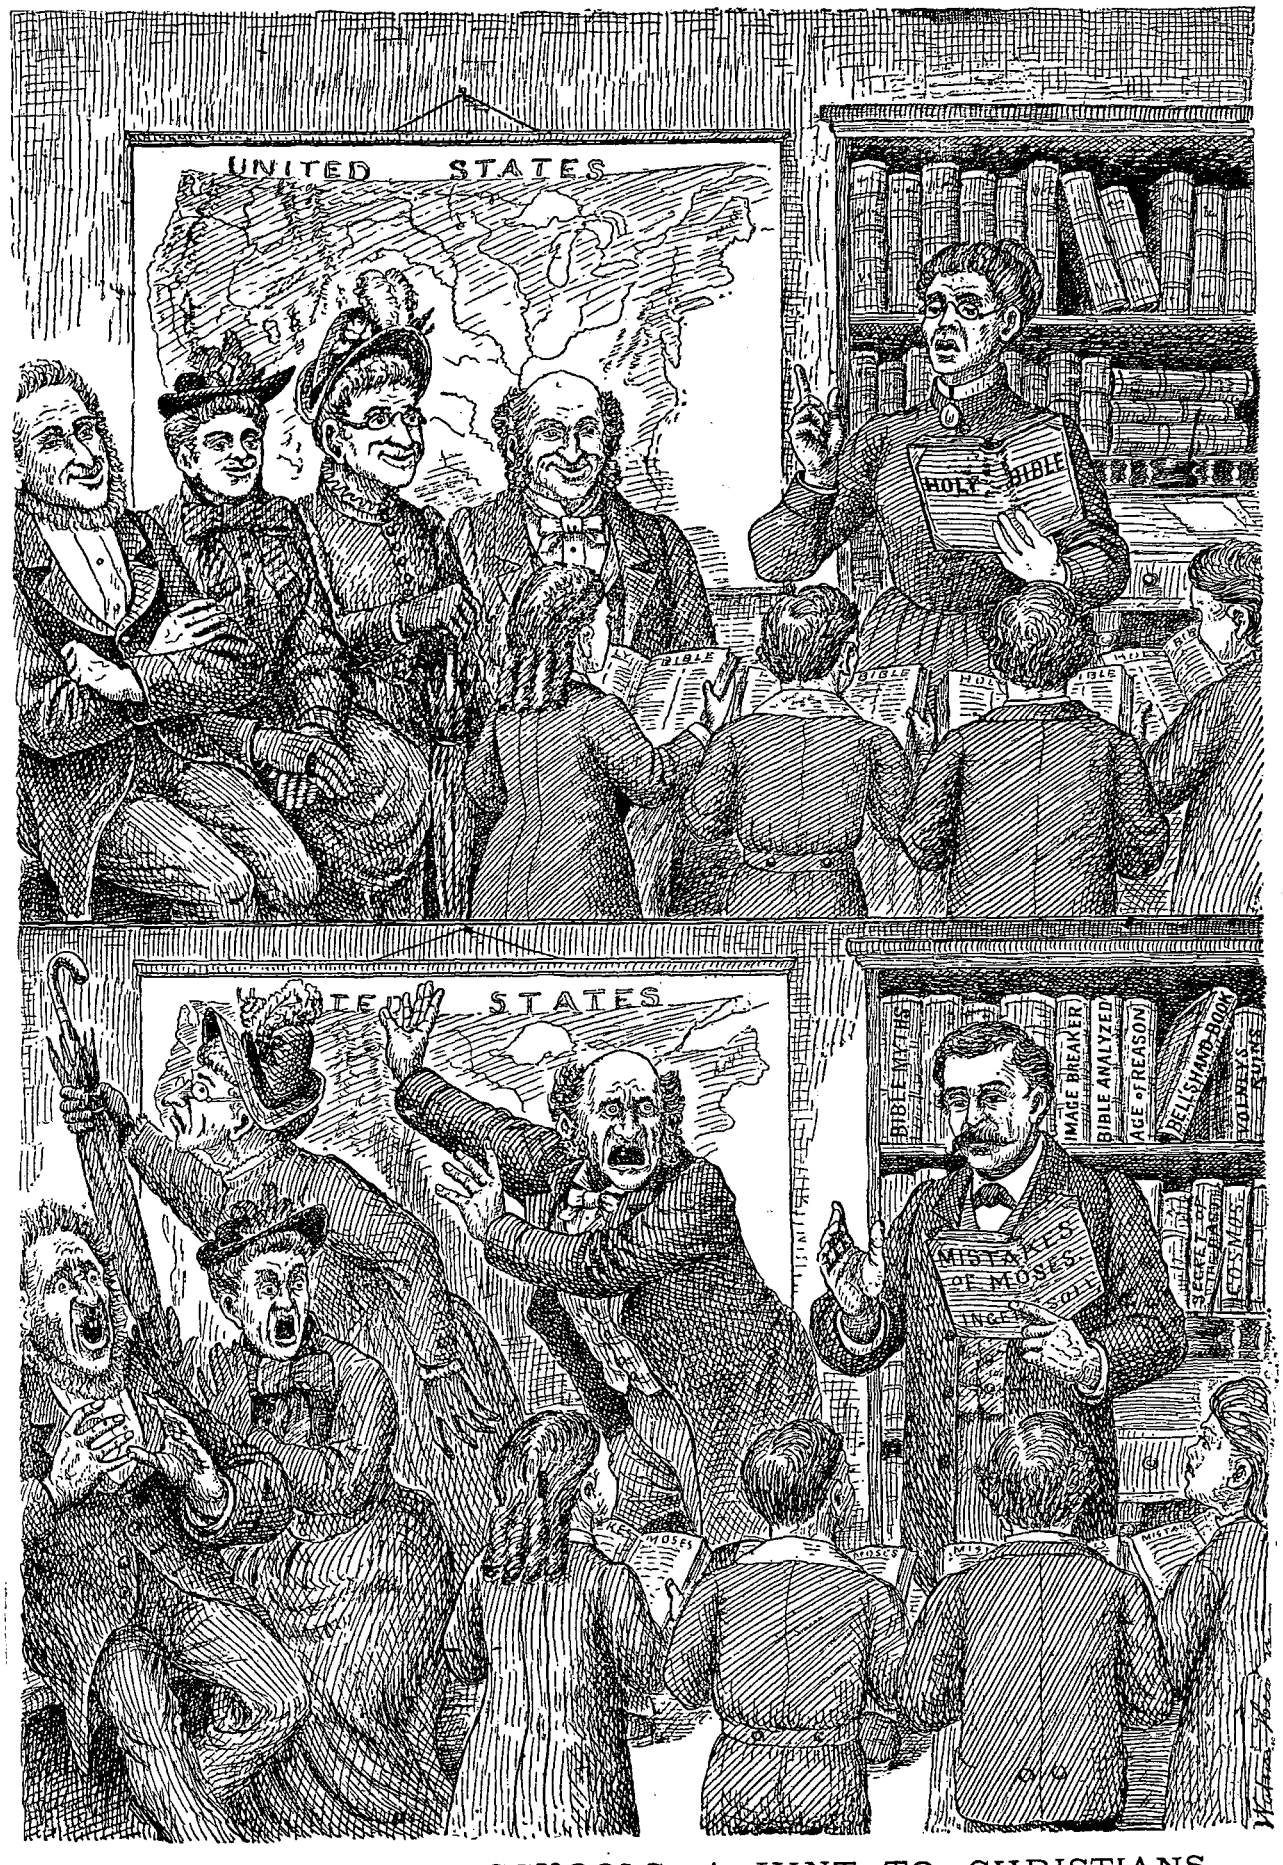
Notes and Clippings.



ACCORDING to one of our subscribers who belongs to Troop G, 1st Cavalry, stationed at Fort Custer, Mont., the outbreak of Cheyenne Indians has been exaggerated. He has just returned with the troop from among them, and reports all quiet, one man only being killed, a ranchman named Ferguson.

A CLERK in the custom-house was told by the deputy collector the other day that his position was vacant, the offense being writing letters to President Harrison and the Brooklyn postmaster. The clerk's name is Azariah. When notified that he must leave he threw up his hands and protested solemnly, "Nobody but Jesus Christ has power to suspend me!" He refused to go, and devoted himself to addressing another of the manilla envelopes which he has loaded the Brooklyn lamp-posts with. This had on it: "Benjamin Harrison, you are a thief! You bought your way to the president's chair! Damn the pope!"

SPEAKING of the city election in that city, the Abingdon Enterprise says: "The pulpit struck a blow and every argument imaginable was brought to bear on the voters." Now, by what right did "the pulpit strike a blow?" If the pulpit has a right to strike a blow at a city election, then it has a right to strike a blow at any and at all elections—at national, state, congressional, and all other elections. Is the pulpit a political rostrum and the church services on Sunday a political meeting? We tell you, Mr. Enterprise, and all you preachers, you are treading a volcano, when you turn your pulpits into political rostrums, and your Sunday services into political meetings, whether at city elections or state and national elections. Our political institutions were not built that way. We say to you, hav a care. The world had enough of that sort of thing for a thousand years and more all over Europe.—Galesburg, Ill., Press and People.

MRS. AMELIA BLOOMER, who is now ninety years of age, comes along with a tardy denial that she invented the Bloomer costume from which she achieved an extensiv fame. She was not, she says, the first person to wear it, this distinguished honor belonging to Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Miller. Mrs. Bloomer took up the brief gown where Mrs. Miller laid it down, and wore it for five or six years in public and private. Mrs. Bloomer does not wear the Bloomer skirt now, but contents herself with the garment of conventionality.

NOTWITHSTANDING the decision of the supreme court of Wisconsin that the reading of the Bible in the public schools of that state is unconstitutional, the school board at Egerton has continued to use the Bible in its opening exercises. The result has been the issue of a mandamus commanding the board to cause the teachers to cease the practice.

RELIGION IN OUR SCHOOLS.—A HINT TO CHRISTIANS.

THE Catholic News says: "The Women's Christian Temperance Union, in defiance of all truth, honesty, and Christianity, assails Chief Justice Taney in his honored grave. This is a sad picture of the moral condition of these ladies. Unless they repent and make their peace with God, they must be numbered with the reprobates. It is a sad and melancholy state of affairs. But truth is powerful and must prevail, even if some American ladies devoted to temperance, and who suppose themselvs to be Christians, lose their immortal souls. Chief Justice Taney did not declare that the negroes had no rights which the white man was bound to respect. On the contrary, he deplored the actual state of public opinion when the Constitution was formed, and when the Dred Scott case came before the Supreme Court of the United States. Refer, unchristian women, to the decision as it stands in the reports. What does Chief Justice Taney say? Here are his words: 'It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted; but the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken. They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race either in social or political relations, and so far unfit that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect.' Consult the laws of Virginia, Maryland, New York, New Jersey, and even Massachusetts, and you will see the truth of what the chief justice states. See the negroes burning at the stake! See the murders committed, where the murderer escaped because there was no witness but a negro or a Catholic! See the children of negroes sold to buy Church of England altar plate! Shame on you women who degrade the name of American and Christian by your slanders. Let me cite in conclusion the words of a Puritan worthy: 'Unless you repent you'll all be damned Barebones.'"

THERE was a colored baptizing in Atlanta the other day, reports the Journal of that city, but one of the converts was missing. When the committee went to look her up they found her in the station house. She had "borrowed" a white dress to be baptized in, but before she had occasion to wear it the owner missed it, took out a search warrant, and found it in the good sister's possession. As a matter of course her arrest followed, and the church is now minus one member.

The Lord's Prayer in Our Public Schools.

Religion, like the measles, is contagious, can be caught in a minute. Liberalism is evolution, always a slow process; it results from exercise of the reasoning faculties, and can only be attained by earnest thought and diligent study. Honest-hearted people remain ensnared in superstition because they do not think. Many are really amazed, horrified, that anyone should object to the use of the Lord's prayer in our public schools. They hav used or heard the prayer all their lives; always regarded it as the grandest embodiment of Christianity, inculcating holiest reverence for Christ and God.

Discussion will bring out the facts, and convince honest Christians how grossly they hav been deceived by taking things for granted without thought or examination.

I want to call attention to a few objections to the use of the Lord's prayer in our public schools, from the most devout Christian standpoint.

To use it is in direct violation of the express commands of Christ. In the verses immediately preceding the form of prayer (Matt. vi, 9–13) Christ admonishes us in these words, verse 6: "But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy father which is in secret."

The revised version reads: "But thou when thou prayest enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to the father which is in secret." How can we expect our children to reverence and obey the teachings of Jesus in other matters if we by precept and example teach them to disregard his plainest instructions in regard to prayer? If Christ did not mean what he so distinctly and unequivocally declares, who has authority to inform us what he did mean? The Roman Catholic depends on the pope and the unwritten tradition, but what will Protestants do who declare "the Bible is our sole rule of faith and practice?" All are opposed to the teachers in our public schools giving their sectarian interpretation to any Bible texts. So the children must accept scripture just as it reads, and if they do they can form no other idea from the words of Christ than that he requires they should, when about to use that form of prayer, go alone to their room and carefully shut the door so that none can see or hear them. Christ insists the prayer should only be offered in secret. To offer the prayer in a public school is then to teach the scholars to ignore and despise the teachings of Jesus.

It is never quoted as Christ taught it. The Lord's prayer when used in our public schools is never repeated as Jesus gave it. Consequently every repetition of it destroys reverence for Jesus, since even the very prayer he taught us has, before it is suitable for our use, to be altered and amended by the wisdom of man.

Christ says: "When ye pray, say, And forgiv us our sins, for we also forgiv everyone that is indebted [indebted, Greek, opheilonti, what one has lent, a debt, what is justly due to anyone] to us" (Luke xi, 2, 4).

The revised version reads, "For we ourselvs also forgiv everyone that is indebted to us."

Ere we can offer this prayer we must remit, discharge, forgiv everyone who justly owes us anything or we declare a lie to the very face of God. Surely we ought to object to hav our children thus taught to be utterly regardless of truth.

It will be claimed the prayer is generally repeated as given in Matt. vi, 12: "Forgiv us our debts as we forgiv our debtors." But in Matthew's version of the prayer we find an addition (verse 12): "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever, amen"—fourteen words not found in Luke's version and omitted by Matthew in the revised version. If the assertion that we forgiv all debts due us can be altered and amended, and fourteen words added in the very prayer Christ taught, will not children be inclined to doubt all scripture? How are they to know when it is right to accept Matthew and reject Luke? If such discrepancies are daily forced upon their attention as exist in the Lord's prayer in Matthew and Luke, both alike inspired of God and written under direction and influence of the Holy Ghost, is there not great danger that the minds of the more intelligent pupils of our public schools will be filled with serious doubts of the divine inspiration of any part of the holy scriptures?

It should not be used because it is blasphemous. The Lord's prayer should not be used in our public schools because its teaching is derogatory to the character of God, inasmuch as it charges God with leading us into temptation. "And lead us not into temptation" (Matt. vi, 13). No other inference is possible but that God tempts, solicits us to sin, and that it is necessary to every day earnestly pray to him to induce him to refrain from so doing. The subtle theologians try to mend the matter by saying that in the original it is, Suffer us not to be tempted, put us not to trial or test. But the average pupil of our public schools is not up in Greek. The Greek is parazoo, to make trial, to prove, put to the test, to prove by soliciting to sin, to tempt; whence perasmos, trying, temptation, soliciting to sin. If school children desire to know the meaning of the word they would be most apt to prove scripture by scripture, and find out the meaning of the words tempt and temptation when used in other texts. "And he was there in the wilderness forty days tempted of Satan" (Mark, i, 13). "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation" (Matt. xxvi, 1). "That Satan tempt you not" (1 Cor. vii, 5). We hav no way provided to prevent the devil from tempting us. But we can coax God not to tempt us if we pray him not to. "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man" (James i, 13). Any ordinary smart child at school would wonder, if God never tempts any man, why did Jesus teach us to ask God not to lead us into temptation, and again, why James, inspired of the Holy Ghost, declares God does not tempt us. And it is certainly blasphemous to claim God does tempt or solicit us to sin. Yet the same Holy Ghost inspired Luke to write that Jesus said, "When ye pray say, And lead us not into temptation."

The use of the Lord's prayer in our public schools robs children of self reliance, hinders and discourages cultivation of the principle of doing right from love of right and discourages cultivation of courage to resist evil. Matt. vi, 13: "But deliver us from evil." That is, we are to rely on God to deliver us instead of making effort ourselvs. God leads us into temptation, and so if he does not deliver us from the evil, he alone is responsible for any sin committed, since he leads us into it, and being almighty could deliver us if he would. If he does not and we perpetrate any crime, it is simply because it was his will and desire that we should. Suppose the Bible lesson preceding the Lord's prayer was Rom. ix, 11–23. Verse 18 reads: "Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will hav mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth." Verses 21, 22: "What if God, willing to show his wrath and to make his power known, endured, with much long suffering, the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: And that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy which he had afore prepared unto glory." If the ninth chapter of Romans is true, God leads us into temptation and does not deliver from evil unless we are of the elect. It is true Rom. viii, 28, declares: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose." That last clause is carefully omitted by the ministers. Not to those who love the Lord, but to those only whom he did predestinate for glory, do all things work together for good.

The Lord's prayer should not be used in our public schools, because it is simply a Jewish prayer, the paternoster of the Kadesh. It is intensely objectionable because it is un-Christian, for it utterly ignores Jesus and teaches that we hav no need of Christ as our mediator, savior, or redeemer. It instructs us to go direct to God in our own right, as a child to its father, needing no intercessor. "Our father." Our wants are to be made known and forgivness of sins obtained, not through the merits or the atoning blood of Jesus, but on our own merits, because we "forgiv our debtors." There is not the faintest allusion to Christ, or any intimation that we hav any need of him in any way. Christian, honest now, do you desire your children to be taught Judaism in our public schools? Suppose the teachers read for a scripture lesson, "Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no savior" (Isa. xliii, 10, 11).

If, it is claimed, it is Jesus, the savior himself, who is speaking, then, "I am the Lord and there is none else, there is no God beside me. I girded thee though thou hast not known me: That they may know from the rising of the sun, and from the west, that there is none beside me. I am the Lord and there is none else"* (Isa. xlv, 5, 6). If this is God, the father, speaking, he most positivly denies the son. If it is Jesus, he as positivly denies the father.

Now, after reading the scripture, let the Lord's prayer be repeated.

Mark the perfect harmony. God in the Old Testament denies the savior, and the Lord's prayer in the New Testament repudiates and ignores the savior.

Oh, from a Christian standpoint, how very objectionable is the use in our public schools of the Lord's prayer!

In conclusion just one objection from a patriotic standpoint. All admit that the very first duty of our public schools is to inculcate love and devotion to our republic, a desire to perpetuate and sustain our American institutions, a government by the people, for the people. Will this be most surely accomplished by teaching the children to every day pray to God for the speedy establishment of a kingdom? Will centering all their hopes of future happiness and glory in a coming kingdom—the every day praying, "Thy kingdom come"—inspire self-sacrificing devotion to the republic?

C. B. Reynolds.

*The declaration of Christ (John x, 33), "I and my father are one," quoted by dishonest quibblers, trying to make it appear God spake of himself and Jesus as one person, is explained by Christ himself (John xvii, 21): "That they all may be one, as thou father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us."

Christ declares he and God are one, only as all believers may be one in him and God.

Ghostology.

The word "spirit" and the thoughts associated with it lie at the foundation of religious faith.

As the word represents an abstraction or a phantom, it has received no settled, accepted definition.

Not cognizant to the senses, it cannot be manipulated nor analyzed. Each is at liberty to teach, be taught, or believe what he can, what he is told, or what is popular in his church, in his community, or whatever he may hav inadvertently accepted in his childhood, respecting it. Since its existence cannot be demonstrated to the understanding as are more material things, everyone is at liberty to believe what he pleases.

It is curious to observe how people are affected, influenced, as they come under the different varieties of this faith in spirits, or the spirit. What serious and sad mischief some forms of it work on human life and character!

The old and popular superstition that faith is far above and superior to reason, has done much to prepare the mind to acquiesce in the belief, and to trust implicitly in what is taught by the church and religion concerning the spirit, without caring to inquire or to know anything more or further as to the authority, origin, or authenticity of the vague and conflicting theories and notions people entertain.

They believe it and are satisfied, and they would rather not be disturbed.

The history of a religious faith is identified, if not identical, with the language in which it is first recorded.

Religion had much to do in developing language, and in turn language much to do in developing religion. They hav both added much in developing mental activity, but they hav been very far from always wisely engaging the mind.

Religion had its uses in building up faith and thus leading men out of savageism. Knowledge will next supplant faith and lead men out of superstition.

We can trace our religion back to Greece through a connected history. Our ideas of spirit originated or prevailed there.

Not one of the King James committee of forty-seven who gave us our authorized version of the Bible was a competent Hebrew scholar, nor could tell us the meaning of these abstract characters or hieroglyphics of the ancient writers. The Greeks had the Old Testament fluxed into their mythological dialect in a translation called the Septuagint, centuries before the Christian era.

From this avowedly corrupt Greek version of the Old and the grossly corrupted Greek New Testament, where spirits, angels, demons, ghosts, and every other form of the invisible personalities are made to figure in fantastic roles, as found in the popular literature of that day, and pictorially represented in our Bible, we hav derived our spirit theories and ghostologies, which hold us with such firmness and fidelity to our faith in the "spirit," which is the foundation and origin of that divine religion we call Christianity.

Some of the opinions and beliefs of other pagan nations of Europe hav been incorporated with them since. The philosophers, the more learned and wise men of Greece, had a rational use for the word in their language which represented our word spirit.

With them it meant the animus, impulse, the motiv, the sense or feeling that impelled men to action.

It was uniformly understood among them and was intelligently used to express a definit thought.

But the vast people, the uneducated masses, with the slaves, took the abstract term without any clear meaning or understanding of it, and built on it, to it, and around it a stupendous theory and system of mythology.

They gave to the spirit a personality; it existed in thousands of forms and qualities. It was everywhere, did everything. Every motion in the outer world and every emotion within living things was produced by spirit, or a spirit. It was a demon, a spirit, a ghost, or a God, and all physical nature was alive, permeated and governed by these invisible existences. Except with the few philosophers, this was the universal belief. There was an inferior mythical literature produced adapted to this faith. The preparation and dissemination of this gave employment, popularity, and a living to those engaged in it. Men with a little learning—sufficient to read and write—without science or philosophy, but ambitious for distinction as leaders, would naturally be attracted to this field.

Some of the more learned writers and scholars in that day took advantage of this mythological state and taste of the people and adapted the style of composition to it, as we see in Homer's works, the "Iliad" and "Odyssey." These writings in mythological style are now our standard of Greek literature, called the classics. They hav for nearly two thousand years been the texts and the theme for the inspiration, in divinity schools, for professors and students.

The Christian clergy generally derived their faith in spirits from this source. The epistles of Paul and the other New Testament books were written by parties partially under the influence of this Greek faith in spirits.

So that we find passages in that volume derived from the philosophers, and others representing the mythology as held by the masses of the more ignorant and superstitious. The philosophers and most cultured men of Greece would not descend from their wiser philosophic opinions to the corrupt compound faith as compiled and taught by their less intelligent and inferior contemporaries, who became apostles and advocates of the system of religion they built up out of tradition, mythology, allegories, metaphors, fables, and legendary stories, and called Christianity. Our New Testament abounds in passages recognizing a faith in these Greek demons or spirits.

Yet there are passages just as distinctly representing the rational, intelligent view of the spirit as held by the philosophers. Modern Christians are divided in their faith and some are mixed and uncertain about what they should believe respecting what is called spirit.

We all get our views from these ancient Greek writings, and from the comments, the speculations and religious creeds, derived from what men hav thought they teach. It is wonderful what a fascination and infatuation our early lessons from these exert over the mind. Men of extensiv learning, of broad, rational, and scientific views on everything else, are as but credulous children in what is called religious faith.

They can grow up and onward in everything else, but they are paralyzed as to power to grow out of this.

So the generations seem to be enslaved by a mental bondage apparently irremediable. In conversing with educated and even learned people it is surprising to find how childlike and imbecil and sometimes ridiculous they make themselvs appear—how blind and utterly unconscious they are of the folly and weakness of their faith. They innocently hold on to the ignorant Greek faith and speak of the personified demons as complacently as did their ignorant, degraded, mythological ancestors, without meaning to sanction the low and vulgar views of a darker age.

They cannot see nor appreciate the true meaning which ancient scholars expressed through this word spirit. No, there is nothing marvelous, mysterious, or fascinating to the mind and feelings in the original, true view of the meaning of spirit.

There is a morbid craving for exhilaration, for the startling or exciting influences of the invisible or unearthly on the mind; hence it is drawn by an affinity for and a feeling after the extraordinary, the superhuman, and invisible. The popularity and permanency of the faith in a demonology has grown up out of this fact.

People will find their gratifications if they can, even at the expense of reason and the established truth.

The spirit of a thing is the purpose or true view for which a thing exists.

The spirit and purpose of law is to restrain and reform the evil doer and to protect society.

The spirit of the Constitution of the United States is to protect and preserve the rights, interests, and prosperity of the people.

The spirit of the gospel is to save men and not destroy them. It is to reform, elevate, and purify life.

Let the letter seem to teach what it may in these things, the spirit and objects of them all as understood by their authors and teachers, and as meant to be taught to the people, were to save, to improve, to advance and exalt the condition of the human family.

Jesus and Paul by the text are made to teach this view of the spirit, but the Greek writers of the New Testament evidently did not believe it. Most people prefer the Greek to the rational definition of spirit.

Later authors, such as Milton and Swedenborg, hav defended and embellished the Greek faith.

Milton did not believe in his own theories, but he indulged his genius in constructing an artistic poem for his own entertainment and the amusement of mankind, as Homer seems to hav done in the Iliad.

Swedenborg appears to hav labored seriously and earnestly to maintain as genuin the principles and elements of the old Greek mythology. Thousands hav been captivated with the charms, the ideals, and pictures, with which he has embellished the existences, the functions, and environments of these demons.

He has elaborated a modified, if not in some respects a new system of faith out of the fragments that hav come down to us from their ancient literature. He has his followers and admirers organized into the "New Church."

Not a few of distinguished English writers hav taken great liberty with the word, and each given to it a new and fanciful definition. Prominent among these are Bacon, Locke, Pope, and Shakspere. All being standard authors, they hav established their different ideals of "spirit" in our literature. So that spirits hav gradually taken on these protean shapes and mystical meanings among us.

Most of our religious sects were started, and their dogmas and creeds were formulated, when but few of their adherents could either read or write to any purpose, and received their spirit theories and theologies from a credulous and bigoted priesthood, following the lead and light of these classical expounders of their Greek prototypes in embellishing "the faith once delivered to the saints."

How the pious thank God for these revelations of the mystery of godliness!

Modern Spiritualism is another phase of the same ancient mythology, started from nervous phenomena in a family in the state of New York. A tremendous and widespread faith has been constructed out of these and similar phenomena in some other places, and out of a well-planned system of necromancy that has grown up in connection with it which has been extensivly patronized and profitably pursued for a quarter of a century. There was something so strikingly fascinating, so beautifully attractiv and comforting in this modern Spiritual theory of spirit personality, that multitudes hav been enamoured with it and hav given in an adherence to it, because it was so hopeful, so promising, and gracious.

This modern, happy theory of the spirit simplifies ghostology, by relegating it from realms of joy or torment in the future, to the present and to the spheres of the living. This modern theory is a practical return to the old Greek mythology, where the Gods, ghosts, or demons were ever present and became "spirit guides" or "guardian spirits," who prompted, inspired, and impelled the living to all their thoughts and actions. Then human beings could not liv as such, or at all, save by the aid or permission of the Gods. All matter was vivified and life tolerated at their mercy or caprice. With this belief consistently could they say, "Of ourselvs we can do nothing," and use similar expressions, and honestly record them in their holy books—our New Testament gospels—for the benefit of their successors through all coming time. Modern Spiritualism as such would not exist among us, nor other forms of the ghost theories as found in our church theologies, had we not been taught by these Greek writings that the lessons there found were a divine inspiration, as a revelation from the chief of these Gods, the Jehovah of the ancient Hebrew writers.

These theories and doctrins of spirits are so general, having come down to us through so many centuries, and are so interwoven with what is considered the best life of the people, and they appeal so to our highest ideals of the mysterious and marvelous in what we are taught as creativ wisdom, we cannot soon expect to see them all surrendered. It is considered too much for human nature to endure. So they are cherished in some form by the living for the comfort there is in the thought that these spirits do exist for our benefit, and that in leaving this world we will join the angelic hosts who really liv and think and love, endowed with a personality, somewhere and somehow in the realms of space beyond all forms of tangible matter. If it is an illusion it is tender and beautiful, and the believer asks, why seek to deprive us of its consolations?

Are illusions always to constitute a portion of our experience? Are they indispensable to the existence of a rational, intelligent being? If there is such a halo of fascination about them that life is defectiv or a failure without them, it is time it was known, and that the forces which are dispelling them were arrested. We know Greek life was much involved in them. We know they existed with terrific effect in Europe in the Dark and Middle Ages, and exercised a prostrating, magical power. To deny or doubt the popular faith in them was heresy, dangerous, if not death. Witchcraft was one of its forms and had its day. Science, intelligence, annihilated it.

One by one these illusions are falling before science. It threatens in time to sweep them all away. Must it be permitted to march on till it produces this sad catastrophe? Is man material and rational enough to liv in a world of realities? Or must he always be suspended between the false and true, the real and fanciful, the visible and invisible, as the only genial and natural place on the theater of life?

Ingersoll on Vivisection.

From the Globe-Democrat.

Robert G. Ingersoll has addressed the following letter to a Boston philanthropist on the evils of vivisection:

LAW OFFICE ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.
45 WALL ST., NEW YORK, May 27, 1890

PHILIP G PEABODY, ESQ, Boston, Mass., My Dear Friend: Vivisection is the Inquisition—the Hell—of Science. All the cruelty which the human—or rather the inhuman—heart is capable of inflicting is in this one word. Below this there is no depth. This word lies like a coiled serpent at the bottom of the abyss.

We can excuse, in part, the crimes of passion. We take into consideration the fact that man is liable to be caught by the whirlwind, and that from a brain on fire the soul rushes to a crime; but what excuse can ingenuity form for a man who deliberately—with an unaccelerated pulse—with the calmness of John Calvin at the murder of Servetus—seeks, with curious and cunning knives, in the living, quivering flesh of a dog, for all the throbbing nerves of pain? The wretches who commit these infamous crimes pretend that they are working for the good of man; that they are actuated by philanthropy; and that their pity for the sufferings of the human race drives out all pity for the animals they slowly torture to death. But those who are incapable of pitying animals are, as a matter of fact, incapable of pitying men. A physician who would cut a living rabbit to pieces—laying bare the nerves, denuding them with knives, pulling them out with forceps—would not hesitate to try experiments with men and women for the gratification of his curiosity.

To settle some theory he would trifle with the life of any patient in his power. By the same reason he will justify the vivisection of animals and patients. He will say that it is better that a few animals should suffer than that one human being should die; and that it is far better that one patient should die, if through sacrifice of that one, several may be saved.

Brain without heart is far more dangerous than heart without brain.

Hav these scientific assassins discovered anything of value? They may hav settled some disputes as to the action of some organ, but hav they added to the useful knowledge of the race?

It is not necessaay for a man to be a specialist in order to hav and express his opinion as to the right and wrong of vivisection. It is not necessary to be a scientist or a naturalist to detest cruelty and to love mercy. Above all the discoveries of the thinkers, above all the inventions of the ingenious, above all the victories won on fields of intellectual conflict, rise human sympathy and a sense of justice.

I know that good for the human race can never be accomplished by torture. I also know that all that has been ascertained by vivisection could hav been done by the dissection of the dead, or at least of animals completely and perfectly under the merciful influence of ether. I know that all the torture has been useless. All the agony inflicted has simply hardened the hearts of the criminals without enlightening their minds.

It may be that the human race might be physically improved if all the sickly and deformed babes were killed, and if all the paupers, liars, drunkards, thieves, villains, and vivisectionists were murdered. All this might, in a few ages, result in the production of a generation of physically perfect men and women; but what would such beings be worth—men and women healthy and heartless, muscular and cruel—that is to say, intelligent wild beasts.

Never can I be the friend of one who vivisects his fellow-creatures. I do not wish to touch his hand.

When the angel of pity is driven from the heart; when the fountain of tears is dry,—the soul becomes a serpent crawling in the dust of a desert.

Thanking you for the good you are doing, and wishing you the greatest success, I remain,

Yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL.

The African Missions.

H. H. Johnson, a Christian African explorer, admits in the Nineteenth Century that African missions hav not been successful. "Many of the missions," says he, "number among their adherents all the drunkards, liars, rogues, magdalens, and unclean livers at the colony." He tells of some nativ Christians who cooked and ate the bodies of some nativ Christians whom they had killed in a quarrel, and their nativ Christian pastor merely suspended them from church privileges—did not expel them. He further says: "I regret to say that with very rare exceptions nativ African pastors, teachers, and catechists are bad men, possessing not a particle of true religion and not even the sturdy, manly virtues of their savage forefathers." All of which goes to prove that Christianity has made them worse instead of better.

MEN are not concealed under habits, but are revealed by them; they are their true clothes.—Thoreau.

Religion—What Is It?

What palpable deceit but for thy aid,
Religion?—but for thee, prolific fiend,
Who peoplest earth with demons, hell with men,

"Thou taintest all thou lookest upon," is indeed a truth which cannot be denied, for wherever we look in the past history of the world it will be seen that the prevailing system of religion has always been the precursor of evil. When Christianity grew strong and held intolerant sway, society was bleeding at every pore. Whole towns were slaughtered, and vast countries desolated. The young and the old were left to perish on the hillsides, cities were burnt, thousands were murdered, because the Christian church had determined to become masters of the world. Previous to the Christianity of Constantine, when Cæsar ruled, the whole earth groaned under the terrible despotism of loot-paid robbers, and under the cruel hand of religion the condition of the people improved nothing during the hundreds of years of popish supremacy. In three hundred years during the activity of the infamous Inquisition, three hundred thousand persons were, by its command, burnt, strangled, or imprisoned as heretics, and the struggle to free the world from the terrible hand of despotic conquerors and from the intolerance of the presumed almighty priests would not perhaps hav ceased ere now had not these human gods quarreled in their councils and crushed each other. It is indeed lamentable to know that in this supposed age of toleration men still exist who believe it a horrid crime for the people to think for themselvs in matters of religion. Monster Custom has in all ages created zealous conservativs eager to uphold the cruelest and most tyrannical abuses. But as imprisoned wild fowl refuse to breed, so caged thought cannot grow, while fettered reason soon becomes stone-blind.

The intellect of slaves is always groveling. Their fettered thoughts hav no wish to rise, hence the rule of the priests was long and terrible.

The fever of imagination, which led on the earliest reformers, at some length, after years of weary toil, arduous undertakings, almost unsurmountable obstacles, produced in the hearts of the people the first germs of the purest religion that can be conceived, called the religion of humanity, or in other words, man's humanity to man. This is no God-ordained religion, and one which needs no help from the priests.

There is in man a permanent and imperishable hope which takes a firm hold on human nature itself. If it dies or is destroyed under one form, it will come to life again under another without the help of those pious frauds called priests.

There is, however, a vast difference between real religion and the religions that are common in many nations; it is indeed the difference between religion and superstition, or the difference between a practice which is desirable or useful, and a belief that is incapable of verification by experience.

Real religion teaches a man to be cheerful and joyous, that gloom is not his only mood, and that innocent recreation is not vanity. Objects that instruct the mind, enlarge the understanding, purify the heart, and create blissful emotions, these it is always religious to contemplate, and no enlightened moral man can doubt it. A thousand calamities overtake man in life, and when in the midst of ruin and misery the popular religion of Christendom directs his attention to unknown causes to explain known effects. When surrounded by pestilent vapors and decomposing substances which produce pain and sickness, popular religion says, "Set your affections on things above." And if man constantly fixes his eyes on the heavens, it is no wonder that he is sometimes found stumbling with his feet. While on the other hand "real religion" points direct to the known causes of disasters and insists on their removal, it discovers the methods of nature upon which health depends and instructs man to regulate his life according to these methods.

Popular religion destroys the happiness of mankind by placing virtue on a false foundation. The prevailing dogma amongst religionists is that the good of this life should be despised, for they urge that the possession of good here is an obstacle to the enjoyment of good hereafter. Therefore a religious man can neither obtain much happiness himself, or impart so much to others, as the man who thinks it desirable to find the greatest amount of bliss in this life, without any regard whatever to the question of a future state of existence.

Real religion is a binding principle, and not a collection of dogmas. There is no religion worth holding but that of right doing, and whosoever pretends to more or practices less than this is beside the truth. The good, the great, the noble hav ever reverenced the religion of justice, and that includes all virtue. It asks of no man no course of conduct at variance with his highest interest. To be honest in his belief, truthful in speech, faithful in conduct, are characteristics of real religion.

"Mysteries of religion!" There are great and obvious reasons why priests pretend to see mystery where all is as clear as day. When a system of religion is formed, although it may be full of unreasonable creeds, I grant the difficulty of forsaking it; but why do men cling so tenaciously to it? It is because the priests, the supposed, or pretended messengers of God, hav enveloped it in mysteries which hav been too great for the masses in their ignorance to disperse and break through. But there is no need of mystery in real religion, for all is reasonable and natural, and there are men to-day who will, I am proud to say, do broad justice now, and strive to make progress a grand fact. Why is there need of mystery? Why should we forsake knowledge and manliness? The practices of presumed mysterious dead men are not to be accepted as guides for living and reasonable beings. The fading, flickering lights of barbarous nations, of extinct generations, are decidedly incapable of deciding the moral standard of the present day. Christians hav monopolized the dictionary, and hav given a term of heathen origin a private interpretation. Religion has been so long associated with superstition, cruelty, and despotism, that all honest people hav an aversion to those who pretend to believe and practice it. Nevertheless, a really good man is to be revered, although he be found among thieves. Thoughtful people look on popular religion as a species of commercial tree, the branches and leaves of which shelter birds of evil genius, and the articulations of these birds are to be considered an evil omen, while the mysteries are employed by them in order to hide their infamous intrigues, engross men's attention, and keep them in ignorance. The time that might hav been appropriated to the diffusion of useful knowledge has been spent amidst the confusion of useless knowledge.

The motivs of real religion exist in our own sense of right, and the known advantages of a virtuous, useful, and truthful life; for it is a truism that the good alone are truly great, noble, and happy. These truths are discoverable only by trials and experiments. They are not built upon any mysterious doctrins or ancient myths, but on the real nature of man. Mysteries are not fitted for man. They cumber him in his onward path, they cramp his energies, divert his intellect from a useful course, and make him a wild enthusiast, a miserable dupe, an oppressed slave, or an artful tyrant, all of which are great stumbling blocks in the path of progress.

Religion, what is it and what is it doing? We can see in our daily intercourse with those who are self-styled religious that they endeavor, to the utmost of their ability, to transform faith into respectability. Religion controls power unjustly through its organization, monopolizes offices for its proteges, raises agitations for its own security, erects a censorship in order to control the workers; it bribes the press, threatens public societies, usurps places of power, denies the freedom of thought and utterance, erects schools for demoralizing the minds of our children, occupies the pulpit, the platform, and the press in preaching error for individual profit. No sensible man to-day sincerely believes that it is for the love of education that the churches take such interest in schools, but the gist of the whole matter lies here. The school is the theater in which the mind of the child is molded into the cast which keeps him the dupe of the priest. Without schools the churches would be extinct in one generation. Therefore it is a work of necessity with the priesthood to pervert a positiv good into a pregnant evil. The work of the followers of real religion is to meet this decisivly and in earnest. The freedom of the world is not to be won by mere declamations or generalized abstractions, but by strictly attending to the minutiæ of life. Real religion would cultivate the judgment so as to discern a fallacy or an imposition, and, by the justice of our inference, to proceed to strengthen the true by adjudicating upon the false. Real religion would teach man that to be useful in life he must study the acts, and by them the motivs, of his enemies, for the softest sward may contain a pitfall, and the smoothest tongue may construct a lie as leprous in its power as calumny. Despots do not thrive by the institutions of the country, for despotism can only exist when the human mind has failed to cherish liberty. We are at present living in critical times, for within the past few weeks we hav witnessed one of the grossest outrages upon the liberty of a people, perpetrated upon the person of Moses Harman. By this act alone, the case of Mr. Heywood and others, the liberty of the American press has been menaced and threatened, and who can say that the next step the bigots will undertake will not be to place a limitation or restriction on public meetings, a step which Americans should never allow? The inference to be drawn from the above case is decisiv. Christian ministers lead the people to destruction by interfering with the social regulations of the country. They keep the pulpit and would try to usurp the platform. They levy blackmail on the rich and tax the poverty of the poor. They sow discord between man and man, and with most audacious effrontery they liv upon stolen revenues bequeathed to feed and educate the poor.

O that the wise from their bright minds would kindle
Such lamps within the sphere of this dim world,
That the pale name of priest might shrink and dwindle
Into the hell from which it first was hurled.

Religion, what is it? It is a heavy chain which binds the slave, it is the corner-stone of the fabric on which priests hav built for ages in fancied security, it is a cramp which has seized many a strong swimmer in the stream of life, and disabled him until the waves hav cast him on the shore a dead and useless member of society. It is the scepter with which the few rule the mass. It is poison to the intellectual man and fine food for the fool. Wrapped in a Bible, with a miter and a crown, under the protection of the sword, for ages it has lain a weight upon the minds of the people and debased the world's intellect. Real religion would lift us up, while popular religion would keep us down.

Let us dare to be honest and scorn to be mute
While priests are degrading the popular mind;
For, armed with the truth, we can't fail to refute
Their transparent sophisms whene'er we're inclined.
Let us join in the conflict, then, now being fought
'Gainst falsehood and fraud, and manfully dare
To loudly proclaim in language the thought
That religion's a mockery, delusion, and snare.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Great Evangelist.

To anyone who cherishes an interest in the welfare and progress of the human race, it is painful to see how low an attitude the popular religion of the day occupies in the scale of justice and morality. One of the evidences of this fact is that Sam Jones is styled by the public press, and accepted by the Christian masses, as "the great evangelist."

The people of this city are in some respects very sensitiv and exacting on questions of decorum and propriety. For years their extreme sensibilities hav been shocked by the existence of a variety theater in their midst, and when at last it was closed, it seemed to giv universal satisfaction to the prospectiv saints. Strange as it may seem, this very religious class hesitate not to giv their unqualified approval and support to Mr. Jones, who, in the name of religion, fulminates billingsgate so low and offensiv that it would put to shame the star actor of a variety theater troupe, and that too without exciting the least signs of protest from his sanctified hearers. He has just finished a series of meetings here, and at the close preached a sermon exclusivly to men, and was very severe in his denunciation of swearing; yet at the same time relieved himself of a sufficient amount of fish-market slang and pot-house vulgarity to discount in offensivness a whole deck-load of profanity. The worst feature of the whole matter was that there was not a newspaper in the city that had the inclination or courage to condemn this open and flagrant outrage against the laws of morality and decency. We would not defile the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER by giving literal quotations of these evangelistic slang phrases. If anyone desires to know of their special nature, he can find modified extracts of them in a recent issue of the Nashville American.

Upon what ground can this unqualified approval of clerical blackguardism by the Christians of this and other cities be explained? We hav given the matter some thought and can attribute it to no other cause than the low and debasing influence of the Bible.

Any man or woman that can accept as the word of God that old compilation of contradictions, errors, falsehood, cruelty, outrage, and obscenity, is thereby qualified to indorse without protest Jones, Talmage, and the great army of evangelical slang-slingers who are a disgrace to the age in which we liv.

Take, for examples, the delectable stories of Noah and his drunkenness, Lot and his revolting incest with his daughters, Abraham and his wife blackmailing the shepherd kings, "the expulsion of Hagar," good old Jacob lying Esau out of his rights, Judah's liaison with Tamar, his daughter-in-law, by the roadside. Then start in on the long, hideous, crime-stained career of Moses, characterized by murder, rapine, outrage, treachery, and cruelty. Next wade through the horrors, wrongs, and bloodshed described in the books of Joshua and Samuel, and wind up with the history of David and Solomon, with its murders, adultery, incest, rape, and outrage, and you hav a record of crime in its most ultra phases that has no equal in any book, written and published by any people, in any age; and when any class, by Sunday-school and pulpit training, can be deluded into the belief that this horrible record is the word of God, and that such old drunken, lecherous reprobates as Noah, Lot, and Judah, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, and Solomon, were righteous men and in high favor with God—when thus deluded they are ready to indorse Sam Jones, Talmage & Co., and accept their driveling as the gospel of truth. I think we do wrong to cherish any sentiment of censure or reproach against this unfortunate class. Our first step is to down the Bible as a code of morals. It is the chief obstacle to-day to the upward and onward march of man to a higher civilization and a purer morality.

Christ said: "He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." What a great benefit he might hav conferred on the world by transposing that command to the following: "He that is just and truthful and doeth right shall be saved;" but by "grace ye are saved through faith," and thus do Christians propagate doctrins that discourage right doing, and license crime. For are we not constantly reminded that our own "good works are as filth and rags," while faith is the chief desideratum in the salvation business? If we can free society from the pestilent teaching of the Christian theology, there is enough of innate good in men and women to guide them aright, once that the original sin—"Jesus paid it all"—and the heaven, hell, and damnation is removed or taken off them.

On Feb. 24, 1886, Sam Small said in Farwell Hall, Chicago, that he would sooner hav a drunkard for a teacher in the public school than an Infidel. Well, this was a perfectly natural conclusion for a man who accepted Noah as a "preacher of righteousness," and Lot as a "righteous man." Jefferson, Franklin, Paine, Ethan Allen, and many scores of men of their high intellectual and moral standing, cannot excite any spirit of approval with Mr. Small, but his habits and principles being in strict keeping with the old Bible reprobates, of course he would prefer the latter to the former.

The Bible is a filthy fountain sending forth its fetid waters through a hundred thousand channels to poison, distemper, and deprave the stream of human life. Pedigree it, expose its rottenness, and when it is shorn of its pernicious influence through Bible class, church, and Sunday-school, man will make a new departure and will soon experience a higher and purer life career than is possible for him to reach under the orthodox régime of total depravity, salvation by faith, and the blood cleansing, Jesus-paid-it-all theories. A Legal Criticism of a Judicial Charge.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A very careful examination of the charge of Judge Carpenter in Heywood's case, published in your last issue, has convinced me of its injustice and unfairness.

It is impossible for any fair-minded lawyer, approaching the subject with a judicial mind (which, in the last analysis, simply means unembarrassed with partiality or prejudice), to avoid the conclusion that Judge Carpenter was guilty of a wicked intent to usurp the province of the jury, and to influence them to convict the man who stood before him, presumed to be innocent until found guilty by the jury in the free exercise of their judgment. To make this charge against a judge is, as any lawyer knows, a serious accusation; but it is not possible to arrive at any other conclusion.

Judge Carpenter starts out by asserting a proposition which is absolutely untrue in law, and is a violation of a truism so elementary that it is probably laid down to students in every law school of the country as an axiomatic truth in the very first week of their scholastic instruction. If Judge Carpenter's legal knowledge is to be gaged by this assertion we must hav but a poor idea of his acumen.

"There is no freedom in this country for a man to do anything except to do right." I oppose to this the assertion that "nothing is (legally) wrong but that which the law forbids."

If it were true that freedom only consisted in freedom to do right, there would be as many varying laws as there are conceptions of what is right. It is useless to elaborate argument on this ridiculous dictum of Judge Carpenter, who if he knows any law will be ashamed to see this part of his charge reproduced in cold print.

But worse immediately follows. The judge proceeds to take the case out of the hands of the jury, and practically directs them to find against the prisoner by assuming as proved what it was the sole province of the jury to find. Judge Carpenter told the jury:

1. That the act of offering the papers to the postmaster was with the intent to mail [clearly a question of fact for the jury].

2. That the act of asking the postmaster if he would take the papers for mailing was proof of guilt, because "respectable journals are deposited without fear of it." This was a most outrageous intrusion on the province of the jury, more suited to a prosecuting officer than a judge.

3. Judge Carpenter then assumes as true what it was the sole province of the jury to find as a fact, as follows: "If a man desires not to do his duty in good faith, with a foul object, if he desires to sail as closely as he can to the commission of a crime, if he desires to get as many indecent words as he can into his paper, or words that are just close to indecency, and yet escape," etc.

Here are assertions of the judge, first, as to the animus or intent of the prisoner; second, as to his having committed a crime; third, as to the language being indecent, all of which were questions for the jury.

There are no qualifications in the charge which submits these questions as facts to be passed upon by the jury, but the judge throughout refers to them as propositions without dispute. That this was clear error see 2 Park Cr. 223, 15 How Pr. 557, 6 Park Cr. 209, People v. Rogers 13 Abb. N. S. 5370.

The questions of law passed upon by the judge, or what he calls "technical questions," indicate an equal degree of want of knowledge of law.

1. That to bring a basket of papers to the postmaster "offering them to the postmaster for transmission through the mails" is equivalent to depositing them in the post-office, when the postmaster refused to take them, as was the proof in this case, must be a shocking proposition to any person with the most elementary knowledge of legal principles.

2. The judge neglected to charge the jury at all upon the most vital element which went to make up the essential element of the offense charged, i.e., what is "obscene, lewd, or lascivious" within the meaning of Section 3893 U. S. R. S.

Judge Carpenter did not define either of these expressions, but left it to the bucolic minds of the jury to giv to the words on which the indictment was based any interpretation they pleased, saying, "Every person has frequently heard them and knows what they mean. . . . You must therefore determin whether the language so used is obscene and the words used are fit and proper under the circumstances under which they were printed."

As late as 1882 it was held that language may be coarse, unbecoming, or even profane, and yet not within the act; but the charge of Judge Carpenter makes no distinction whatever which the intelligence of the average juryman could entertain. See U. S. v. Smith 11 F. R. 663. Judge Carpenter finally again usurps the prerogativ of the jury by declaring that the paper mailed by Heywood was "a lewd, lascivious, and obscene" paper. Now, this was just what the jury were there to determin, and it is impossible to conceive of anything more reprehensible than such language from a judge to a jury, expressed without qualification, reserve, or limitation.

I desire not to fall into the fault of Judge Carpenter and to prejudge his case before the bar of public opinion; but as no man is so depraved that the law can afford to refuse him a fair trial conducted according to the immemorial forms of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, I hav no hesitation in declaring that to find a parallel for this charge of Judge Carpenter in the Heywood case it would be necessary to go back to the evil days of a Jeffreys or a Scroggs.

Yours truly, AUGUSTUS A. LEVEY.

Thoughts On Prayer.

'Tis true as Pope expresses it, "'Tis education forms the common mind," but I am afraid it will be many years hence ere the absurdity of vociferation in prayer will become unfashionable. The folly of praying to a personal God! A God who has his pets and favorits! A God who is willing and able to suspend the laws of our stupendous universe to mitigate the poignancy of our follies, crimes, and blunders.

The writer has before him several Roman Catholic and Protestant prayer-books which hav daily usage in our churches and at public ceremonials. These prayer-books speak badly for the intelligence of their originators and supporters, and cannot be justified save on the plea of ignorance or fashionable hypocrisy.

Prayers from the above-named books, if addressed to an earthly sovereign, potentate, or friend, could not be offered without being held as a direct insult to the recipient's intelligence, wisdom, power, and goodness.

In our walks through life and conflicts in its various mutations we should ever bear in mind nature's inflexible laws, and expect no favoritism for their transgression. A single illustration will convey my meaning.

Two individuals are supposed to be crossing a stream of water in a boat. It upsets. The prayerful, pious unfortunate, in hope for aid from his "personal God"—but in violation of all natural law—elevates his arms and hands above his head and consequently sinks and drowns. The other unfortunate, availing himself of the art of swimming—perhaps somewhat irreverent in expression—strikes out for the shore and is saved.

The writer would by no means decry the indulgence in audible prayer if the patient is so inclined. It seems to be a species of flesh-brush, and perhaps tends to vivify the soul's torpid cuticle of the vociferation or patient.

The most consistent body of Christians known to the writer is the society of "Friends," known as Quakers, who make no audible prayers. These Christians are aware of the emotional or psychological effect of auricular appeals, and justly conceiving God to be a divine spirit, as such worship him.

Items of Foreign Christian News.

The members of a Greek Catholic church in Scutare, Albania, are divided into two hostil camps. The patriarch of Constantinople called a certain priest to fill the pulpit of the church, against the wishes of a part of the congregation, who started a tumult the very first day the priest officiated; it came to bloodshed, and Turkish soldiers had to be called in to quell the disturbance. Several lives were lost and the church is now closed by the Mohammedan authorities. "How these Christians do love each other!"

According to the Frankfort Kurier, the prince-regent of Bavaria has ordered all Catholic officials of that country to take part in the public Corpus Christi procession. The German empire is getting to be a very pious country; the Liberals should wake up before it is too late, and their only salvation from ecclesiastic tyranny is found in a strong organization which dares to put a bold front to the enemy.

The Christians of Jonköping, Sweden, lately held a prayer-meeting in which they besought their God to help Mayor Palmgrun in the lawsuit brought against him by Henry V. Borghell, for unlawful piety, as exhibited in his preventing the latter from giving a series of lectures in said city. Of course their God will help them.

The Salvation Army has held its yearly conference in London. It appears that the army now consists of 8,880 officers commanding 2,799 corps, distributed in 32 countries. The contributions amount to $3,790,000. The weekly papers hav an aggregate circulation of 678,420 numbers, and during the past year 1,811,700 meetings were held. Even the Salvationists can teach us Freethinkers a lesson; let us "go and do likewise." G. N.

W. S. Bell Caned.

The meeting of the San Francisco Freethought Society last Sunday night was a most pleasant affair, including an address and a presentation. The hall was filled with an intelligent audience; Prof. W. S. Bell was the orator of the evening, and "Popular Objections to Freethought" was the theme of his discourse.

During the lecture Mr. Schou occupied a front seat. He was loaded with a handsome cane, which he desired to present to Professor Bell, and with a speech for the audience. As soon as opportunity was offered he delivered both. Taking the floor Mr. Schou held up the cane and proceeded to describe it. The wood, he said, came from Palestine, and was therefore holy. The head of the cane was of horn, and, having a hole through it, could be similarly described. As for the band covering the joint of the stick and the horn, that was of coin silver, one of the gods of the American people, and therefore holy. On behalf of the Freethought Society and the Liberals of San Francisco, Mr. Schou would present this cane to Professor Bell as a token of their esteem and a pledge of their admiration and good will.

There was great enthusiasm. Mr. Bell accepted the gift with thanks, but failed to show sufficient emotion to justify the customary statement that he was deeply moved. On the contrary, he was quite cheerful. He looked at the cane a moment reflectivly, and then remarked that it was Cain that killed Abel. History repeated itself, and here we had once more the conjunction of cane and a Bell, though without fatal results. Mr. Bell made other jokes of equal atrocity, and then, speaking more sanely, thanked the donors for this evidence of their kindly remembrance, and retired amid a salvo of applause. As previously stated, it was a most pleasant affair.—Freethought.

Married.

It will be of deep interest to the Liberals throughout the United States to learn that our friend who in youth was a Garibaldian volunteer; who, a few years afterward, was promoted for gallantry in the Union service; who later on was a member of the executiv committee of the International Typographical Union; and subsequently, chairman of the executiv board of the general assembly, Knights of Labor; who more recently was the energetic Secretary of the American Secular Union—widely renowned as a dashing and fertil newspaper correspondent—Mr. E. A. Stevens, was united in marriage at Chicago, on Tuesday, June 17th, to Miss Ella Godman Stiles, youngest daughter of the late John C. Godman, for many years treasurer of Morrow county, Ohio, and a niece of James Godman, ex-auditor of the state of Ohio.

The happy couple hav our warmest congratulations and we sincerely hope that their pathway through life may be strewn with roses. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

A Voice From the West Indies.

A new religious sect has made its appearance in Trinidad. They look very much like the Salvation Army. A few Sundays ago in the center of a small open square in the east end of this city there were three individuals, one of whom was a female distributing tracts, of course of the usual gospel-grinding class, such as "Come to Jesus," etc. A large crowd assembled, composed chiefly of the "rag-tags" of the city. Singing commenced with the usual sermons, prayers, etc., but after a while they scampered off, perhaps to try their skill in fresher fields, and, who knows, more remunerativ.

Among the religious feasts none is observed with more sanctity and veneration by the Roman Catholics than that of Good Friday. Good Friday is a day on which all saloons, or, as they are called here, "grogshops," are forced to close by the government. On this day bands of street Arabs and ruffians armed with rattlers and carrying with them effigies of Judas Iscariot, parade from street to street howling and rattling their rattlers, according to them to drive the devil away.

Last week there was another feast, Corpus Christi, which is also observed both by church and state. On this day the Roman Catholics, headed by a brass band, march around a large square facing the cathedral, and stop at several places where altars are erected. From these altars they offer up prayers, with the usual incense-burning, holy water sprinkling, etc.

It is a peculiar coincidence that on that day it always rains. It looks as if "the Lord in his divine benevolence sends them strong" showers of rain to stop their processions. When Roman Catholics are asked, "Why does God send down rain to stop your procession?" "Oh," they say, "he is glad, you know; it is a sign of approval." Fine style, indeed, of showing approval!

The Anglican bishop is at it again with his flock. This time it is again on account of the cross on the altar. He has threatened excommunication to some who hav stopped going to church on account of that appendage. There is at present a tremendous religious controversy going on in the island.

Our friends at Barbadoes are to the front. They hav formed a branch of the national Secular Society and are determined not to be left behind. Our friends also at Venezuela hav started their first Freethought paper. It is called El Libre Exame, and from its tone it looks as if it will do a great good on the neighboring continent. Success to them all.

The Scope of the Harman Prosecution.

In David Overmyer's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the comments of other Liberal contemporaries, I regret to note that the main point is omitted, and perhaps by a premeditation of despair. They all sentimentalize about the hardship with which Harman is treated; but they do not squarely face the question whether any besides or above his subscribers are the legal and constitutional as well as natural and moral judges of the contents of the paper they pay for.

There are even petitions for pardon being circulated, and by organs that affix the principle of personal liberty. Now the purpose of an invasiv party aiming at imperial despotism, and which would hav this accepted in fact before proclaiming it, may be as well served by an act of pardon as by an iniquitous punishment; better even if this is rendered unpopular by the personal conditions of the victim. Mr. Overmyer seems to regard the case as indefensible merely because his judgment and taste condemn such publications as Dr. O'Neil's letter. Why, that is a very proper reason for subscribers to withdraw their support from the paper, but when, or by what constitutional laws, was the faculty of such censorship conferred upon judges or juries outside; much more, that of jailing a publisher for presenting what these censors may not like? What facts or what arguments of any weight may not the representativ organs of the party in power condemn as obscene or blasphemous or treasonous?

Liberty of the press must be complete or null. If untrammeled by law, no one can exercise it save at his own cost, and just in ratio as he offends his supporters, his influence ceases.

Mr. Overmyer may probably assent to these positions; yet regard them as untenable before a Kansas court.

It seems that Mr. Heywood hopes better from those of Massachusetts, but the constitutional question comes before the Supreme Court of the United States.

The autocrat of Liberty deplores the impolicy of confronting the established powers on an issue which, besides the nastiness of the O'Neil letter, is unpopular, from its opposition to marriage, which he regards as a fatal consequence of our false economic arrangements.

Certainly, the emancipations of woman and labor are intimately linked; but the main point, of the liberty of the press, is all the same, whatever the particular occasion that questions it. This principle is all the more salient, by reason of the bad taste displayed in the letter. I deplore, therefore, the apologetic tone of pleading Mr. Harman's "good intentions." A governor or president may base a pardon upon these, or on Mr. Harman's personal conditions, but they are not to the purpose as regards a free press.

The conspirators for despotism would of course select for their first experiments some unpopular extremists, but little sagacity is needed to foresee the extension of their index expurgatorius, if they succeed, by default of energetic combination among the friends of personal liberty in defense of their rights, constitutional, moral, and natural.

Not improbably members of the Supreme Court of the United States hav been sounded and their consent to the conspiracy secured; nevertheless, an appeal to this court is inevitable. If it sustain the constitutional liberty of the press, it must put down the Comstocks and Fosters. If it side with them, it will help to effect a necessary crystallization among the friends of liberty analogous to Russian Nihilism.

The enemies of personal liberty, i.e., of all except their own to oppress others, would like to hav the case of Harman and Heywood considered as personal, isolated, and accidental. I opine that on the contrary it should be considered as one of the premeditated steps of an invasiv policy, the ultimate object of which is to establish a despotic theocracy.

Obscenity is but the casual pretext here. It is not pretended that there was any in preceding persecutions of Walker and Harman for their so-called "autonomous marriage," a family affair.

The Walter Reid imprisonment, the stoppage of the Sunday mails, the Blair and compulsory education bills, the provisions of the new census, all invasions of personal liberty, cluster round the protectiv tariff banner of the party in power, which increases its corrupt influence by pension bribery carried to extremes hitherto unheard of, such as "compensation for mental agony" during the interstate war, which General Trumbull ridicules in the Open Court.

Rationalism and Soap.

A Rationalist ought to take the best possible care of himself, believing that there will never be but one edition thereof. I read in Secular Thought lately the remarks of a doctor in regard to the care of the teeth, which he summed up in "White Castile soap and a brush." I asked a druggist for some and he threw out a cake branded "Colgate." It was only ten cents, but I had read so much in THE TRUTH SEEKER about him and am acquainted with one of his agents, and think he loves tyrannizing more than he hates obscenity, so I asked for some other brand. The druggist insisted that I take that and said it was English soap molded over. It was only ten cents, he said, a trifle. But I did not like to giv Colgate the profit on even ten cents, and besides, if a man is a hypocrit, as I judge him to be, I would be afraid to use his soap; it is probably not what it pretends to be. At last the druggist produced some other which from its brand was not Colgate's; I took it, used it, and found it excellent.

Some years ago a villain was writing anonymous letters of the vilest character to the most respectable girls in this place. If he had been caught he would hav been hanged without the formality of a trial. Whilst we were trying to entrap him the postmaster sent for a prominent member of the Vice Suppressor's Society. He took it very coolly, did not think much of it, not a very grave offense, and I made up my mind from talking with him that it was because there was no heresy in it. Unadulterated obscenity is not what they are after. The agent told me in so many words that the book for mailing which Bennett was imprisoned was not unmailable matter.

Extract from his letter to W. H. Burr, Jan. 7, 1875:

I am confident that you must agree with me, when I say that there has been no such failure in humanity, which renders it absolutely essential for any form of mediumship between God and man or between the living and the dead. And as to modern mediumship I hav always said that it was a godsend to humanity, because it is the most efficient remedy for ancient mediumship, assumed between us and God. And for this reason humanity will owe a debt of gratitude to the modern form of mediumship, down to the latest ages. It is the old adage, "A hair of the same dog cures the bite."

With me man's condition after death is an open question, and the more so from my familiarity with modern mediumship. For twenty-five years I hav had daily conversations with invisible personages. But I do not know who they are nor on what planet they were born. I do not know what a "spirit" is. They hav told me many stories, but I do not know that they once had a human body like mine. If they did, then I incline to the opinion that in the death of the body all its memories perish, and we begin on the other side of Jordan, de novo, a new life, similarly as we began this life without any memory of our former state. Certainly, this theory will explain the condition of a large percentage of "spirits" who cannot remember their own names, or anything else, until we suggest to them what to say. Indeed this is only what spirits themselvs hav said to us.

WAS HORACE SEAVER A SPIRITUALIST?

Extract from a letter of LaRoy Sunderland to W. H. Burr, May 18, 1874:

I hav been familiar with Mr. Seaver for more than twenty-five years. . . . When his wife died some years ago it was by his request that I attended and made an address at her funeral. And so also at the funeral of his mother. . . . His wife was a medium and he admitted her clairvoyance, while he ignored it in his paper. And I hav heard him challenge people in public to come to his house where he would allow them to witness the real phenomena in dispute, called Spiritual.

The Bible and the Public School.

From the Independent.

We hav read, with hearty approval, the opinions recently delivered in the supreme court of Wisconsin in regard to the question of the Bible in the public schools of that state, the full text of which has been published in the Albany Law Journal. This reading only confirms our opinion of this decision as heretofore expressed.

Mr. Justice Lyon delivered the opinion of the court; and Messrs. Justices Cassoday and Orton delivered concurring opinions. The case before the court was that of a petition for a mandamus, commanding the school board in the city of Edgerton to cause the teachers in one of the public schools of that city to discontinue the practice of reading, during school hours, portions of King James's version of the Bible. The petitioners for the mandamus were residents and taxpayers in Edgerton, and presumptivily Catholics in their religious faith, although this fact is not stated in these deliverances. They complained of the practice above referred to.

This petition brought squarely for the court the question whether such a practice is consistent with the constitution of the state of Wisconsin; and this question the court unanimously answered in the negativ. And, that our readers may better understand the case, we submit in the following order the several points decided.

1. The first point is the construction of Article X, section 3, of the constitution of the state, which declares that "the legislature shall provide by law for the establishment of district schools, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable, and such schools shall be free and without charge for tuition to all children between the ages of four and twenty years, and no sectarian instruction shall be allowed therein."

The court held that the reading of King James's version of the Bible in the public schools of the state during school hours, is "sectarian instruction" within the meaning of this constitutional prohibition, and hence inconsistent therewith. Mr. Justice Lyon said that the prohibition "manifestly refers exclusivly to instruction in religious doctrins," and in such doctrins as "are believed by some religious sects and rejected by others." The court took judicial knowledge of the fact King James's version of the Bible is not accepted and used by all "religious sects" in Wisconsin, but is accepted by some of these sects and rejected by others. Hence, as between them, all having the same constitutional rights, the court held that version to be a "sectarian" book, and the reading of it in the manner and for the purpose set forth in the complaint to be forbidden by the constitution of the state.

How any other conclusion could hav been drawn from the premises, we are not able to see. We presume that there is not a Protestant in Wisconsin who would hesitate a moment on the point, if the book read had been the Douay version of the Bible, which is acceptable to Catholics, or the Koran, or the Book of Mormon. The reading of such a book as a part of school exercises, whether for worship or religious instruction, would be offensiv to Protestants, and they would hav good cause for complaint, just as the reading of the King James version, which is sometimes called the Protestant Bible, is offensiv to Catholics. It should not be forgotten that, under the constitution of Wisconsin, Catholics and Protestants hav on this subject precisely the same rights, and that neither can claim precedence over the other. The constitution of the state makes no difference between them, and determins no question relating to their differences, or any other religious differences. It deals with all the people simply as citizens, no matter what may be their religious tenets, or whether they hav any such tenets.

2. The second point decided is, that "the practice of reading the Bible in such schools can receive no sanction from the fact that pupils are not compelled to remain in the school while it is being read." On this point we quote, as follows, the language of Mr. Justice Lyon:

When, as in this case, a small minority of the pupils in the public school is excluded, for any cause, from a stated school exercise, particularly when such cause is apparent hostility to the Bible which a majority of the pupils hav been taught to revere, from that moment the excluded pupil loses caste with his fellows, and is liable to be regarded with aversion, and subjected to reproach and insult. But it is a sufficient refutation of the argument that the practice in question tends to destroy the equality of the pupils which the constitution seeks to establish and protect, and puts a portion of them at a serious disadvantage in many ways with respect to the others.

The plain fact is that not to compel the attendance, upon such reading, of the children of parents who object to it, for the sake of continuing the reading, is a virtual confession that the reading has a "sectarian" character, as between those who desire it and those who object to it. It is merely an attempt to get round what is apparent on the face of the case.

3. The third point decided is that "the reading of the Bible is an act of worship, as that term is defined in the constitution; and hence the taxpayers of any district who are compelled to contribute to the erection and support of the common schools, hav the right to object to the reading of the Bible, under the constitution of Wisconsin, Article I, section 18, clause 2, declaring that no man shall be compelled to . . . erect or support any place of worship." This provision is in what is called the "Declaration of Rights." The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Cassoday on this point is, to our understanding, clear and conclusiv. Bible reading in public schools has the form and intention of religious worship; and this being the fact, then to compel the people by taxation to erect and support public schools, in which such reading is a practice, is to compel them by law to erect and support places of worship. The fact that these places are also used for other purposes does not relieve the difficulty. The constitution expressly declares that the people shall not "be compelled to erect any place" that is used for the purpose of worship. To tax a man to erect and support a public school, and then to introduce the element of religious worship into that school, is to make a combination which the constitution forbids.

4. The fourth point decided is, that "as the reading of the Bible at stated times in a common school is religious instruction, the money drawn from the state treasury in support of such school is 'for the benefit of a religious seminary,' within the meaning of the constitution of Wisconsin, Article I, section 18, clause 4, prohibiting such an appropriation of the funds of the state." The design of the clause referred to is to prevent the state from using the public funds to defray the expenses of religious instruction; and this design is frustrated just as really when these funds are used to support "religious societies or religious or theological seminaries." Mr. Justice Cassoday in his opinion sets forth this point very clearly.

We hav thus given the pith of the argument on this subject as stated by the three justices of the supreme court of Wisconsin. We see no escape from the conclusion reached, and hav no desire to escape it, since we thoroughly believe in its correctness everywhere. To the argument that "the exclusion of Bible reading from the district schools is derogatory to the value of the holy scriptures, a blow to their influence upon the conduct and consciences of men, and disastrous to the cause of religion," Mr. Justice Lyon thus replied:

> We most emphatically reject these views. The priceless truths of the Bible are best taught to our youth in the church, the Sabbath and parochial schools, the social religious meetings, and, above all, by parents in the home circle. There these truths may be explained and enforced, the spiritual welfare of the child guarded and protected, and his spiritual nature directed and cultivated, in accordance with the dictates of the parental conscience. The constitution does not interfere with such teaching and culture.

The doctrin of the constitution of Wisconsin, as thus settled by the supreme court of that state, is, in our judgment, the true doctrin for every state in the Union. It remits the question of religious instruction, as to what it shall be, as to the agency giving it, and as to the cost thereof, to voluntary, private, and individual effort, and devotes the public school, created and regulated by law, and supported by a general taxation of the people, exclusivly to secular education. This principle is in harmony with the nature and structure of our political institutions, and is, moreover, just and equitable as between religious sects. It favors no one of them and proscribes no one of them; and while it leaves them all free to propagate their religious beliefs in their own way, and at their own expense, it givs to the whole people, at the cost of the whole, a system of popular education that is certainly good as far as it goes, and is all that the state can giv, without itself becoming a religious propagandist. Catholics and Protestants alike ought to be satisfied with it. There is no other basis on which the school question can be justly settled as between different religious sects.

Christianity Not the Law of the Land.

From the Oregonian.

A curious controversy is going on in the East over the proposition that Christianity is the law of the land in the United States. The contention was made by a recent Methodist conference to enforce the demand for religious instruction in the public schools. It was promptly disputed by the secular press. This brought a flood of protests and arguments from the ecclesiastical lawyers. The most serious contribution to the discussion is a long letter from Mr. John Jay, of New York, to the Times of that city, collating a large number of judicial decisions which are held to maintain the proposition that Christianity is the law of the land. The letter is a monument of curious and industrious research, but most of its evidence is remote from the real question involved. Many of the decisions deal with questions of Sabbath breaking and church desecration, and involve issues of social order rather than of religious duty. The case upon which Mr. Jay seems to rely most confidently is one in which a man was indicted for reviling the scriptures, and it was held that he could rightly be convicted and punished even though there was no statute directed expressly at his offense. This does not prove that Christianity was the law of the land, even at the time when the ruling was made. It only proves that decent respect for the religious sentiments of a large majority of the community was held to be part of the duty of a good citizen. This principle would probably be held to be a part of the common law by conservativ judges, who would hesitate to assent even to the vague and general statement quoted by Mr. Jay from Daniel Webster that "Christianity, Christianity independent of sects and parties, general, tolerant Christianity, is the law of the land."

The trouble with this statement is that it is a rather sentimental generalization, expressed in terms having no meaning which answers to the actual facts of existence. Religion, as we hav to deal with it in the actual affairs of life, as the law finds it, and as it confronts the state, is not a matter of inward sentiment, of spiritual emotion; but a matter of organization, of rule, of formally confessed adherence to specific doctrin, of creeds and confessions and articles, catechisms and rituals, ceremonial observance, and rigid compliance with outward forms. This is the side of religion with which the law and the state hav to deal. In this sense, there is no "general, tolerant Christianity, independent of sects and parties." The law can deal only with the outward, formal expressions of religious belief. There are no such outward forms of expression common to all the bodies calling themselvs Christian. The only things common to all sects are certain ethical sentiments, which Christianity neither invented nor monopolizes; which are the law of this land and of all lands because they are the moral law of the race. The Christian sects hav neither common béliefs nor common practices in matters purely religious. They hav not even a common scriptures. They do not agree in their interpretation of the teachings of their founder, in the articles of their faith, nor in the practices which are its outward expression. The state desiring to recognize and enforce a "general, tolerant Christianity" finds nothing to lay hold of. There is no such thing.

This is the answer to the contention that Christianity is the law of the land. Christianity as a spiritual sentiment may be the law of the world, but Christianity as a professed faith and a body of doctrin, can be the law of no land, because none has been able to frame a concrete expression of its faith and doctrin, capable of statutory definition, to which all or any considerable moiety of its professors can assent. The creeds of the various religious sects hav been the law of various lands in the last ten centuries, as the Spanish Inquisition and the Thirty Years' war testify; but Christianity itself is too elusiv a thing to be crystallized into statutory expression. Roman Catholicism is the law of the Austrian and Greek, Catholicism the law of the Russian land; Lutheranism is the law of Sweden and Norway, and Anglicanism the law of Great Britain, but Christianity is the law of no land under the sun, because its spirit is incapable of statutory formulation, beyond what is involved in assent to the ethical propositions it shares in common with modern civilization. Least of all is Christianity the law of the United States, which was the first enduring government to recognize the inutility of state recognition of religious sects, and the impossibility of state prescription of a general, tolerant Christianity, independent of sects and parties. The only mention of religion in the Constitution is in the prohibition of interference with freedom of religious belief. With this the spirit of the common law, which inculcates a decent respect for religion, is in entire sympathy. Together, they express the entire attitude of the state toward religion, which is negativ and permissiv. All religions are allowed and defended in their proper rights, none is favored or inculcated. Christianity is no more the law of the land than Buddhism or Mohammedanism.

The Sunday Newspaper.

There are very few people who will not be sorry to part with the Sunday edition of the well-edited, healthy-toned Democrat and Chronicle.

It has had a large patronage among the better class of professing Christians, who will now buy some other paper in order not to get behind the news on that day. As for the scruples and the so-called wickedness of publishing Sunday newspapers, the talk about it is the veriest humbug and religious selfishness—nothing more. It is the warfare of one profession against another—a fight between the pulpit and the press for public patronage. A man who recoils from reading a Sunday paper because it is dated Sunday, and will read a sermon published in a Monday morning paper without scruple, is either dishonest, ignorant, or a pious lunatic. He ought to know, and generally speaking does know, that all the work on a Sunday paper is done during the week, finished off on a Saturday night, and printed long before daylight on Sunday morning; whereas the Monday morning paper has to be written up and composed mainly during the holy hours of the blessed Sabbath, while the people are at Sunday-school and church.

In regard to peddling the Sunday papers, it may be said that thousands of dear little boys, anxious to help their often half-starved mothers, make by that means money enough to giv them many necessaries and comforts. We should never forget, in our ebullition of piety, that half the people in Christendom are slowly starving to death for want of proper nourishment, while the other half are living in extreme luxury and comfort. If those who are posing as reformers, but who are in reality religious tyrants, were really honest in regard to what they call Sabbath desecration, they would pitch into the papers that are published Monday morning. But as many of them own stock in such papers, or are afraid to antagonize those who do, they keep their pious mouths closed. Everybody who has any common sense knows that it is not wrong to do anything on Sunday that is honest and good on Monday. Newspapers help men out of their barbaric notions and to clear their brains from the cobweb of superstitions that men hav formulated in order to get power and grow rich.—The Jury.

How Doctors of Divinity are Made.

This is the time when I am anticipating letters from men asking me to use my influence with a college to secure for them the degree of doctor of divinity. I write this, not so much in self-defense as in reference to what is an evil custom. Yes, it is a custom, and it is a custom altogether too common as well as evil. The method is somewhat of this sort: Mr. X. Y. thinks the time has come when he wants to write "D.D." after his name. He looks over the list of colleges among the officers of which he has friends; he writes to one of them; his friend replies that he will do all that he can to secure the degree for him. He then writes to some distinguished and able minister, saying that there has been some mention of himself as a candidate for doctor of divinity in —— college, and he is sure that if this distinguished and able minister will be so good as to write a letter to the trustees of the college, a letter from a gentleman so distinguished will hav great value.

The distinguished and able gentleman writes the letter. He multiplies this able and distinguished minister by some six or ten. The impression created among the trustees of —— college is that the world is demanding that the degree of "D.D." be conferred upon this man; and, nine cases out of ten, conferred it is. All this is bad. It is bad for the man who receives the degree. The degree is somewhat of a lie. It is not conferred as an honor, but is conferred as the result of his own personal application. It is bad for the college, which is dragooned into giving a first-rate degree to a third-rate man. It is bad for the meaning of the degree itself, debasing it. It is now in certain ways more honorable not to hav the degree than to hav it.—Correspondent Chicago Advance.

NATURAL laws are immutable, that is to say, they are inaccessible to caprice or to outside influence, and they must be regarded as being as eternal as matter and as nature itself. Nothing can happen in the universe, be it the greatest or the least of things, except by the influence and as the result of natural laws. Rigid inexorable necessity rules the whole and the course of nature. "Natural law," says Moleschott, "is the most stringent expression of necessity." There is neither exception nor limitation here, and no conceivable power is able to escape from this necessity. At all times and for evermore, a stone which is upheld by no support falls toward the center of the earth; never has a command been given, nor ever will such be given, bidding the sun stand still in heaven. The experience of more than a thousand years has pressed on observers the conviction of the immutability of natural laws with ever increasing and at last with such absolute certainty, that not the least doubt can remain as to this great truth. Inch by inch has science, in seeking after light, won their positions from the ancient childish creed of the world, wrested from the hands of the gods their thunder and lightning and the darkening of the stars, and has subdued under the controling fingers of man the mighty forces of the old-world Titans. All that seemed incomprehensible, miraculous, caused by a supernatural power, how quickly and how easily has the torch of investigation shewn it to be the outcome of hitherto unknown or imperfectly estimated natural forces.—Buchner.

A Clerical Political Party.

Under the thin disguise of a "Citizen's Movement" the clergy of this city propose to "go into politics." In the general dissatisfaction with our present municipal administration they think they see their chance to reinaugurate the "good old days" when the clergy had charge of the political as well as spiritual affairs of the people.

The condition of affairs here at present is that Tammany Hall is ruling the city. Incompetence, corruption, and criminality mark its rule as a matter of course. Several Tammany officials hav been convicted, and a legislativ investigating committee has found that many more of them ought to be convicted. The opposition parties are the Republican and County Democracy. The first stands no chance at the polls; the second but little more, unless reinforced from some quarter.

It was because of these facts that Heber Newton, a Socialistic heretical Episcopalian, and some of his brethren of the pulpit, jumped in with their "Citizen's Movement." The idea was to get the business men and mercantil exchanges to follow the lead of the preachers and start a party which should regenerate the city, clearing its fair fame, fostering its business interests, and cherishing the physical, mental, and moral welfare of the whole people. This, it will be observed, is a large program, and required a large committee to properly take charge of it. So they had a meeting—Mr. Newton and his fellow-reformers—last week, and adopted resolutions providing for the appointment of a "Committee of More than Seventy-five." At the meeting the Rev. Thomas J. Ducey, of St. Leo's Roman Catholic church, explained the objects of the movement. It was started, he said, for the purpose of making nominations for the interests of all classes, to promote the interests and protect the rights of the whole people. He disclaimed that the movement was in the hands of the unjust and unsympathetic rich, or in the control of bosses of any kind, even churchly bosses, though there were so many clergymen present that he felt surrounded by holiness. The movement was founded, he said, on two principles on which both the old church and the new churches could unite, "in the interests of God's rights and our neighbor's privileges."

"The interests of God's rights," is a good phrase, and those who hav read ecclesiastical history will hav little difficulty in understanding it. "God's rights" are the clergy's rights—their right to dictate to the people; to be supported by the people; to hav state funds used for their own purposes; to be exempt from paying taxes; and to be generally high cockalorums in the community, dealing out punishment to their enemies, favors to their friends, and torture and death to Infidels and those who scoff at their pretensions.

When the resolutions had been adopted and the objects of the movement thus lucidly explained, a committee of laymen was chosen. Then thirty-four clergymen were named to constitute a separate committee of directors, among them Mike Corrigan, Roman Catholic archbishop; Dr. Potter, Episcopalian bishop, and the prominent preachers of all denominations. More would hav been selected from the preachers, but sectarianism prevented, Father Ducey rising hastily to protest "that, though there was never any jealousy among clergymen, it would be well not to hav any particular denomination represented by too many of its teachers." The movement then starts off with a figurehead lay committee, composed of respectable business men who occasionally dabble in politics and the clergy who mean to guide the movement.

It was a shrewd fellow who put Corrigan and the other Romanists upon the committee, for it will divert suspicion from them and at the same time keep the Romish church fully informed of all the doings of the new party. When it comes to practical politics the Romish church here never gets left. But if the committee hope that Corrigan will help to overthrow the rule of Tammany Hall they show themselvs totally unacquainted with his church and wholly unfit to take part in any practical affairs of life. Corrigan's church gets all that can be given it through Tammany, and has no reason to desire a change. Neither will she divide with the Protestants. The Protestants' legislativ stronghold is Albany, among the country Protestant members, to whom they owe all the subsidies now enjoyed by them. Rome has got New York, and the honor of figuring among a respectable committee of Protestant clergy will not induce Corrigan to "divvy" the booty.

The committee in its preliminary work administered the usual number of pounds of sugar to "Labor," but at the meeting for the selection of permanent committees "Labor" was carefully omitted from the representation. A labor representativ, Mr. Cornelius Doody, made a speech on this omission. The meeting, he said, had provided for the aristocracy and the clergy, but nothing was said as to what was to be done with Labor. He remembered that when Labor had a candidate most of the men in the room opposed him. They did it to save society. But now the saviors of society send out invitations to its destroyers to meet with them. Notwithstanding this, the labor people were not put upon the committee as representativs, and Dr. McGlynn's name was tabled when proposed. This was presumably done to oblige Mr. Corrigan.

Altogether, this clerical movement is a great deal of a humbug. If it does anything, it will be dividing the opposition to Tammany Hall to keep that iniquitous organization in power. But if a miracle should materialize this fall, and the clerical candidates be elected, New York would be as badly, if not worse, off than ever. "The interests of God" cannot be reconciled with the interests of the people.

The Mormon Persecution.

More and more boldly are the religious and semi-religious journals telling just why the Mormon church property was confiscated by the United States government. The Mail and Express now says:

"Mankind's objection to Mormonism rests not simply on their detestation of a religious system which systematically inculcates disobedience to the Seventh Commandment, which is against adultery, but it rests as well on their utter abhorrence of every tenet of the imposture which, under the name of a religion, inculcates the breaking of every one of the Ten Commandments, in the keeping of which, only, is there life for a man, a family, a community, a country, a globe."

This abhorrence of religious imposture comes with bad grace from a Christian, and especially when the abhorred imposture has for its foundation the same "divine revelation" that has the Christian imposture. And the main difference between Mormon and other Christian adulterers is that the former publicly acknowledge their views while the latter keep them behind the scenes.

But we still insist upon knowing where the United States obtains the power to confiscate church property and suppress a religion?

The Presbyterians and the World's Fair.

The Presbyterians maintain a committee on Sabbath observance, Elliott F. Shepard, chairman, which reports to its general assemblies. At the meeting in Saratoga last month the committee presented a roseate summary of the status of Sabbath-keeping. The committee said it found "that from all sections of the United States and territories and from foreign lands tidings hav been constantly coming during the past year that indicate the strong, steady, and widespread uprising of public sentiment, Christian conscience, and philanthropic, patriotic, and religious agencies for the preservation and proper observance of the civil and Christian Sabbath." It also found, so it said, that "imperial and republican governments on the continent of Europe, Germany and France, Switzerland and Belgium, Great Britain, with other nations, hav joined hands in social labor and hygienic congresses for securing the temporal blessings of the weekly rest-day to all classes of people who work with their bodies and with their brains." But it was in Canada that the committee found the most to rejoice at. The Presbyterians in the Dominion were hard workers, and "for systematic movement, far-reaching methods, extending to every Presbyterian church session and pastor, and for satisfactory information and efficient results, we [the committee] know of no other ecclesiastical organization so complete and so worthy of imitation as this model church work for the preservation and sanctification of the Lord's day."

Returning, however, from foreign countries, the committee then considers our own land, and givs details. The Sabbath question has come to the front in nearly every city and state and territory in connection with Sabbath legislation and the enforcement of the laws protecting the Sabbath against the encroachments and disturbances of railway and steam traffic, excursions to the great summer resorts, public amusements, noisy processions, baseball games, the opening of museums, theaters, concert rooms, libraries, art museums, and the secular Sunday newspapers. Through the exertions of its local Sabbath Unions, Law and Order leagues, and preachers, many Sunday law-breakers hav been brought to book, and the "good work still goes on." The report then continues:

"The approaching exhibition of the industry of all nations at Chicago in 1893 will call forth all the wisdom, energy, and decision of the friends of the American Sabbath to prevent an international profanation of the national rest-day throughout the prolonged period of the World's Fair. Already the tocsin of defiance has been sounded by the enemies who demand its opening on every Sabbath of the Exposition.

"The good example set in the Philadelphia Centennial Exposition of 1876, and by the American Exhibition, with the aid of our government officials, at the Paris Exposition of 1889, should encourage the utmost unity of action for the exhibition of 1893.

"In our last annual report we referred to the fact that efforts were making in Washington to reduce the amount of Sunday labor in various directions. These hav been successful in the following respects:

"The president of the United States (Harrison) has issued an order entirely doing away with the Sunday inspections and reviews of the army. The postmaster-general (Wanamaker) has closed the department in Washington against being used as heretofore by troops of idle clerks and their friends as a lounging and smoking rendesvous on the Sabbath. We also report with pleasure that there is a manifest decrease in the use of the Sunday newspapers by the community, and at least one influential and widely circulated journal, the Rochester Democrat, a Republican paper, has decided to discontinue its Sunday edition. As sample cases we select the following from various parts of the country:

"A vigorous attempt is to be made to enforce the good old Sabbath laws of Michigan at Grand Rapids.

"Elizabeth, N. J.—Mayor Rankin of this city has closed all places of business on Sunday. Everything has been sealed—candy and rum shops and all other places where business is transacted. And the mayor is sustained by the moral element of the city."

The most important thing touched upon in this report is the desperate attempt the fanatics will make to close the World's Fair on Sundays. The enforcement of the "good old Sabbath laws of Michigan," and the closing of Elizabeth's candy shops, are local acts of tyranny which the people who submit to them deserve for their subservience to the fanatics; but if the Sabbatarians shall succeed with the World's Fair it will be a national calamity.

At Philadelphia in 1876 the gates of the exposition were locked on Sunday and opened only to the ingress of prominent people who thus viewed the exhibits without the annoyance of "the mob." It was an outrage inflicted upon the tens of thousands of Philadelphia's workers and upon the hundreds of thousands of visitors who could remain in that city but a few days and who desired to see all that the fair contained. It was the act of religious bigots, of arrogant usurpers of power, of scheming pietists who sought the aggrandizement of Christianity.

Chicago has the reputation of containing many Liberal-minded men. There ought to be formed some organization for making known to the managers of the fair the will of the people in respect to Sunday opening; otherwise the Presbyterian bigots, backed by the national government through President Harrison and P. M. G. Wanamaker, may accomplish their tyrannical purpose.

Mr. Savage Upon Mr. Heywood's Case.

In these columns, June 14th, embodied in a communication from Mr. Heywood, we printed a letter from M. J. Savage, whom Mr. Heywood described as "the ablest and most influential Unitarian clergyman in New England," sympathizing with that gentleman and characterizing his arrest as "petty persecution springing out of the narrowest religious bigotry, rather than a manly zeal for social purity."

A great many of Mr. Savage's friends hav sharply criticised him for writing the letter, their opinions being substantially in agreement with the view of the Boston Evening Record, which could "not believe that Mr. Savage ever saw one of Heywood's disgusting publications." Mr. Savage has now written to the Boston Herald as follows:

"When I wrote my letter to Mr. Heywood I believed I was right. And when I think of it I take little account of misrepresentation or attack, for, though I do not enjoy either, I am used to both. I was out of town during the trial, and consequently its details did not come before me. I had seen several copies of the Word, though I hav never been a subscriber or regular reader.

"I said in my letter that I did not regard his writings as 'intentionally' obscene; but he knows that I hav never agreed with nor indorsed either his ideas or his methods. Since my right to differ from another involves his right to differ from me, and both involve the general right of freedom to think, to speak, and to print, I hav always been ready to contend for this. From Plato down to Tolstoi the right to express so-called 'dangerous' social opinions has been asserted and has also been trampled on. In the court of morals, it seems to me that the intention of the writer is of first-class importance. The publishing of obscene literature, or of such papers where the only object is to make money by pandering to the lowest tastes—this is one thing. But it seems to me absurd to place Mr. Heywood in this category. His only pay for what he seems to regard as a 'reform' is poverty and the jail.

"These considerations reveal the attitude I occupied in writing my first letter. For, while I hav not agreed with him, I hav felt that the engin which crushed him might be turned to crush others who dared to brave popular opinion. For, if what the majority regard as 'dangerous' opinions are not to be tolerated, then liberty dies and progress ceases. But, while all this is true, I find I was not acquainted with all the facts. I meant what I said, and take back nothing so far as concerns the principle I supposed myself defending. But liberty has a hard enough battle to fight, and no one, under the guise of friendship, has a right to load her down with needless burdens.

"Since the close of the trial and my return to town, an article has been shown me such as I did not know anyone had ever either written or printed. I can fight for a man's right to publish ideas I neither hold nor indorse, but I can not, though only by silence, even seem to indorse such an article as I refer to. I therefore ask you to publish this letter, in justice to myself as well as to the principles at stake."

We think Mr. Savage has stated a great truth, and stated it clearly, in the foregoing. "No one, under the guise of friendship, has a right to load Liberty down with needless burdens." We hope Mr. Heywood will get clear of the inquisition, and then reform.

Where Is Comstock?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week we reprinted from the New York Times an editorial charging the Methodist Book Concern with printing a book containing obscene images, printed to cater to prurient tastes and increase the sales. The charge was so plainly made that Dr. Buckley could not ignore it, and in the Christian Advocate he attempts a reply. His reply is a virtual admission of the truth of the accusation. He says:

"The Times, . . . searched the book itself, and charges that it contains indecent illustrations and passages unfit to be introduced into families. The editor of this paper does not personally read every line of all the books that are advertised in the Christian Advocate, and had not read this work till a few days ago. As to the pictures, he finds them such as occur in illustrated books on the uncivilized races of the world; more of them are in this book than others, as it describes the whole of Africa and a greater number of tribes and customs. That there are too many and that some are very coarse is the fact. In the verbal description of such scenes passages are found in books of travel in barbarous regions which, taken apart from their setting and purpose, would seem improper. To isolate them would be dishonest to any book if its general style were unexceptional. . . . Nevertheless, we hav found in this book several passages which are vulgar, and deserving of condemnation. If they had been seen by the firm (which gave orders that every questionable illustration should be omitted—in pursuance of which many were removed) they would hav been rewritten, or the book rejected. If they had been seen by the person who prepared a short summary of the contents with a general commendation for the 'Literary Department,' they would hav been sternly reprobated.

"The author having written other books, some of excellent repute, and the general style being free from occasion for criticism, these repulsiv, obnoxious sentences in descriptions of the appearance, habits, and morals of certain tribes escaped notice. These passages and some of the illustrations should at once be eliminated."

Now, where is Comstock and Soapboiler Colgate, and the remainder of the pious and pure crowd which compose the Society for the Suppression of Vice? Why are not Hunt and Eaton, the agents appointed by the Methodist general conference to conduct the Book Concern, prosecuted? Dr. Buckley pleads guilty to the charge, and offers excuses. Let us examin these excuses and see if they would shield him in the United States court. First. He did not know the improper pictures and words were there. But this is no excuse. Principals are responsible for the acts of their clerks. Dr. Foote was fined $3,500 for an act of his clerk, done without his knowledge, under this very statute which would apply to the Book Concern. Second. The pictures and words are not improper unless isolated. But the courts hav decided that such obnoxious words and pictures must be isolated. It was so held in D. M. Bennett's case; in Mr. Harman's case; in Mr. Heywood's recent case. Judge Benedict would not allow Mr. Bennett to prove the good purpose of the book, or that its general style was good. Judge Carpenter, only two weeks ago, decided that the law did not require that the whole should be obscene to make it unmailable. He said in his charge to Mr. Heywood's jury:

"It has been argued that in order that these papers shall be held to be obscene you must find that each and every part is lewd. This is not the law. In order that you shall find that they are lewd and lascivious, it is necessary to find such matter in them. If you do find it, that constitutes the paper a lewd and obscene one. The fact that there may be very much unobjectionable matter does not excuse it. If you find any part of it so lewd, lascivious, and obscene, you should then resolve the question in favor of the government."

There is the law. Mr. Buckley admits that passages in the book were vulgar and improper. That is enough. Let the Vice Society prosecute the Methodist Book Concern. It has not one excuse that stands the law as it has been construed to the detriment of heretics. No expert proof as to what is obscene is admitted; the purpose of the book is immaterial; lack of knowledge of its character by the principals is no palliation of the offense; and that the great majority of its pages are wholly unobjectionable is just no excuse at all! In short, everything Buckley urges has been decided, and adversely to him. Men hav been sent to prison for doing just what his concern has done, and his excuses hav been swept aside by all the United States courts which hav tried obscene cases.

Let the Methodist Book Concern be prosecuted; or Mr. Harman released, the prosecution of Mr. Heywood discontinued, and reparation done to the memory of D. M. Bennett, a man Buckley has often vilified, but whose oldest and most worn shoes the Methodist editor was never worthy to blacken!

The Trouble With the Prohibitionists.

There was a National Temperance Congress held in this city last month, and some of the speeches made were pretty good samples of Christian tolerance, for as usual the Christians captured the congress, and made it a pious prohibition convention, at which T. B. Wakeman and the labor representativ, Samuel Gompers, seemed somewhat out of place. The different views of the "Temperance" people present as to the methods to be pursued to crush the "serpent in the grass" are, however, interesting. First were the Christians. The Rev. H. C. Bascom held these sentiments:

"If the federal Constitution provides no power to impose prohibition, there ought to at least be power in it to dissolve its infamous partnership with the rum traffic. If the Constitution be such a futil instrument, then for one I say, with Horace Greeley: 'Spit on the Constitution and step on it.' [Wild applause.] If things hav come to such a pass that whisky is dominant in this country, I am ready for my musket."

Jo Cook agreed with him, saying:

"I fear that we may ultimately need the musket. We may hav barricade riots yet. When the path to political preferment leads through the ginmill, free government is a farce, and the future may conceal a tragedy."

Mr. Gompers then put in the views of the working man. Laboring men, he said, look with considerable indifference on the liquor agitation. Liquor traffic reformers as employers usually are more unfair to employees than other reformers:

"Legislativ restriction does not affect the rich, who buy in large quantities, while prohibition has resulted in worse liquor at higher prices than before. Law does not make men sober. Sobriety and temperance result from improvement in men's condition and surroundings. High wages bring this about. There are three classes of drinking men. They are the very rich who hav nothing to do; those who are worn out and drink to brace up at night; and those who are idle. Who can tell how much our trying climatic conditions cause an overtaxing of the powers, and stimulants are indulged in to tone the system up to its work? It is in the physical and moral condition of the workingmen that we must seek for the cause of intemperance."

Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who may be said to hav represented Infidel prohibitionists, took this view of the matter:

"The trouble with prohibition is that it partakes of fanaticism. The prohibitionist cries, 'I am holier than thou.'

"You are defeated in state after state because you put on airs and say, 'We are holier than thou.' You find the working people against you, and you always will so long as you prosecute this course. Prohibitionists would never succeed unless they got the workingman with them. At present the labor question stood athwart the path of prohibition. To bring the workingmen to their side the prohibitionists would hav to change their methods. The question would hav to be put on some scientific basis, and some plan would hav to be devised that would put rich and poor on an equality with respect to the application of prohibition. The true way to succeed with them is to go ahead with prohibition slowly, as far and as fast as it can be enforced. Then keep educating, educating, educating."

Judging from these remarks, it looks as though Prohibition suffers greatly from divided counsels.

Editorial Notes.

A NEW phase of the Heywood case was reached on Saturday morning last, the 21st, reports the Banner of Light, when Messrs. George W. Searle and E. W. Chamberlain, attorneys for Heywood, filed in the clerk's office of the United States circuit court (1) a motion for a new trial, (2) a motion in arrest of judgment, and (3) a bill of exceptions. The latter is reported to raise legal questions of general interest to the public as well as to the accused. These questions will be argued at a time to be arranged between the court and the counsel before Judges Carpenter and Colt, sitting jointly as the circuit court for deciding exceptions.

PSYCHOLOGISTS and medical men may be interested in this: One of our oldest subscribers, Alvah H. Walker, of Southwest Oswego, N. Y., died recently. Last February he wrote: "DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: This is the first time I could hold up my head long enough to write. I don't want you to stop the paper. I think my 'grip' and other complications came to an end yesterday; but say! don't stop the paper nor the pictures." Alas, his hope of regaining his health was not realized, for dated June 7th we received this letter from his wife: "MR. MACDONALD: I write to tell you that Alvah H. Walker died May 17th. His mind grew clear before his death and he saw your paper in its true light, and refused to look at it or hav it in his room. I request you to not send any more." We should like to hav these actions of Mr. Walker explained on scientific grounds—adding, if it will go toward solving the problem, that Mrs. Walker is a Christian.

IN 1881 a Medical Mission was opened in New York city, which has since developed into the International Medical Missionary Society, a Christian institution, which sends medical missionaries to India, China, and Africa. The society has published a tract called "Our Suffering Sisters," detailing the barbarous treatment of women in Burmah and Siam when giving birth to children. In the account there is an exact parallel for every feature in the Markland letter which was objected to in the trial of Moses Harman, and the account is much longer and in more minute detail. A peculiar thing about the society and its circulation of this tract is that one of its officers is the wife of wobble-jawed Killian Van Renssaellaer, treasurer of Anthony Comstock's Society for the Suppression of Vice; and it suggests the query whether the Comstock law is to be enforced against heretics by a penalty of five years' imprisonment, when their charity begins at home, while the mails are free for Christians who express similar ideas in similar language, but confine their efforts to work among the heathen abroad."

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, for which please send me one copy of "The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and the remaining $3 please forward to E. H. Heywood to aid him in his fight against his persecutors, and oblige, THOMAS GODDARD.

BOULDER VALLEY, June 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for the cartoon book, and I hope to see the back-page cartoons in book form, when I will hav one or more copies if money can be had to purchase them. I think they would be immense arguments against the Bible inspiration theory. P. B. MILLS.

SEDALIA, WASH., June 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find $1 to continue my subscription to the best and most Liberal of all Freethought papers. The pictures are all excellent. Continue them. I will as soon as I can send for one copy of the cartoon book now in the hands of the printers. J. D. EDGAR.

CAPRON, ILL., June 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me blank petitions for the Harman case. I hav no money to help him out, but if I can render him any assistance by circulating a petition I am willing to do all I can to prevent such an outrage being perpetrated as to incarcerate a man in a vile prison for five years for so small an offense. Every Liberal ought to spot that judge. He is far worse than a Benedict.

W. I. FOX.

INDUSTRY, KAN., June 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Without THE TRUTH SEEKER I do not see how I could get along, for it would cost me $10 a year if I was to get the same amount of information in book form. I was very glad indeed to know that you received a sufficient number of new subscribers to continue the cartoons, as they are convincing and strike right at the root of Bible superstition. I shall send for one of the "Pictorial Text-Books" before long. J. B. WISE.

ASPEN, COL., June 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10.50 for renewal, with three others all new, and "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" for myself. When you commence work on Bible pictures I will send you money in advance to pay for a copy. I hav used the one dozen Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods" you sent me with grand results. I think it one of the best war guns we hav, especially as a means of getting the women to think a little. With best wishes for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER'S success, I am,

Yours respectfully, FRED. B. MOSES.

POETVILLE, N. Y., June 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Here in our town are quite a goodly number of bright, pretty girls from fourteen to seventeen years of age that belong to the holy Catholic church; and one of the girls, about fifteen years of age, told a lady that is a Freethinker that that old devil the priest asked them questions about what they did when alone with the boys that are not fit to be seen in print. "Why," said the girl, "he asked us things that would just make your face burn with shame." The lady asked her if she answered them, and she said, "Yes, we hav to." "Well," said the lady, "I would hav slapped him right in the face." What can mothers be thinking about to let such vipers talk such stuff to their young daughters here in this enlightened country? Will they never get their eyes open? May my everlasting curse rest upon their priests and their old Italian God.

Yours for honesty and truth, JOHN R. COATS.

HARMONY, IND., June 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see on page 363 a thinker asks questions of the Herald concerning the soul. That saves me the trouble.

There is another little affair that I hav not seen suggested. That is in regard to the making of the mythical Adam. Why was it when the Gods put him up and set him to running they then, as I express it to some of my theological friends, had to chloroform him and go at him like cutting up a hog, instead of making the woman at the same time and out of the same material if they had mud enough?

I am the only man here that will talk. There are others that will talk to me, but from fear of unpopularity or other causes they keep still. I am just fool enough to tell what I think. It hurts the little upstarts of gospel-pedlers. They shy around me; they will not stand fire.

I would like to hear through the columns of this journal a little comment on that Adam and Eve business, just for fun.

Yours with regard, JESSE MAURER.

MOUND CITY, KAN., June 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I will get Heston's pictorial book as soon as it is out. Continue the pictures. Heston is a brick.

If I had a million to invest I would place half of it at disposal to be used against any litigation that might arise to disparage the claims of the Girard will case in cleaning out the church influence that rides over that beneficent institution and impairs its purity and usefulness; also to help out Brother Harman, and Heywood, and Hacker.

The next great fraud—to Christianity—is the financial system adopted by the several prime governments of the world, or Europe and America, and establishing the single metal standard, by which labor and agriculture is cheated and depressed; but the people are beginning to be be educated up to the fact and are combining for liberty and self-protection. WILLIAM B. LEWIS.

SAN MARCIAL, N. M., June 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I donated your paper to our railroad reading-room at the beginning of the year; but, strange to say, it has never got there. The keeper of the room, being a Roman Catholic, and an emissary of the priest, after failing to get permission to boycott the paper from the head of that department, or from the superintendent, assumed that authority on his own responsibility. The brilliant gentleman informed me that Peck's Sun was also excluded from the room. Now, what is the reason Judge and Puck may occupy space on the shelvs? I searched three months for the mysterious fate of the paper, and finally, after speaking of the matter personally to the superintendent, I discovered my crystallized fossil had met all of my inquiries with a willful and unnecessary falsehood, and appropriated the papers to what purposes I do not know. I presume his Democratic Roman proclivities will next exclude Republican newspapers. I am a little surprised that the department official permits such an action. W. J. R.

REDMON, ILL., June 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am with you as long as you advocate freedom for a man to express his honest opinion whether it be right or wrong. It is the best any man can do.

Whenever the strong want to enslave the weak they advocate "protection," and so far it has been a winning card. I hope the time is coming when the people will see that it is a delusion and a snare. THE TRUTH SEEKER thinks our children should be protected. I will vouch for them if they hav made good choice of a father. "Truly our conscience does make cowards of us all." The disciples came to Christ and said, "There are tares among the wheat; shall we pluck them out?" he said, "Nay, lest ye pluck the wheat out also." To destroy all the bad would be to do away with all the good. Rather set them side by side and let us hav the manliness to choose. If we choose the right we are entitled to credit it; if we are protected we establish no virtue. In my opinion the best protection we can giv our children is to be honest ourselvs. Yours truly, MARK ROWE.

LEXINGTON, KY., June 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The defense of the rights of man can only be brought into definit shape by individual reasoning and influence. Condorcet remarks of Voltaire, that he seemed to hav but one object in life, which was to "snatch victims from oppression."

There are always men whose wealth originates in the tears and blood of their fellow-citizens. But it cannot be supposed that institutions can exist much longer which ignore the rights of men.

Where ownership of land is allowed, see how rapidly lots will sell, with none reserved for the poor, so that the future prospect for them is still beggary and injustice. Where, then, shall reform begin which secures anything for the poor? Suppose the government should hold every fifth township or county from which indigent persons may buy at any time as they may plan among themselvs in their own humble way. Let houses be built by the state, no two alike, the finest buildings reserved for those who take the best care of the property. When these poor become capitalists by the purchase of other lands, let them imitate government agents, and reserve houses and lands in the same way. Let cruelty and cruel speeches be no longer the chief luxury of the rich. ALHAZA.

DELAVAN, MINN., June 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Although not a subscriber for your grand journal, I hav been for three years prior to last fall. I then read the paper most attentivly and thoughtfully. I can justly say it enlarged my views on many subjects and broadened and deepened my charity in judgment of others. At present I make my home for the most part with my grandparents, who are both tried and true Freethinkers, and old subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of which they are very much enamored. They hav preserved a portion of the oldest numbers in scrapbooks, arranging "Gems of Thought" in one and the cartoons in another.

I hav this week enjoyed listening to three discourses upon Freethought, rendered by one of our Western lecturers, the earnest, talented, and brave J. E. Remsburg. I had never before heard a lecture of the kind, yet, as just stated, careful reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER and pamphlets, books, speeches, etc., of like matter had prepared me in a measure for what I might hear from his lips, yes, his brain, his heart. He does not storm with noise, contortions, frantic gesturing, or hurriedly uttered sentences. He speaks with a clear tone of voice, moderate yet earnest, portraying vividly and telling the truth. And now, reviewing it all in my mind, I conclude man, lectures, and mode of delivery are all just as they should be. Wherever there are those who contemplate procuring a speaker on this question, should they engage Mr. Remsburg they will, I believe, feel repaid.

That THE TRUTH SEEKER may ever stand to her motto and her name, is my aspiration. ADA L. BRINKER.

STEUBENVILLE, O., June 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that fearless writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER agrees with me in regard to the Catholics being made citizens of this republic, but think he is wrong when he says the day will surely come when we shall hav a Catholic in the presidential chair and a majority of Catholics in the Senate and House of Representativs. As he says, to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and the people of this country when they see the tendency of their present laws, making citizens of every Catholic the pope's minions send over to this country, will see to it that the citizenship shall be withdrawn. This will be drawing the teeth of the hyena that is bent on devouring us. But we cannot do this without repealing the naturalization laws altogether, as they would claim it was making a religious test to deprive Catholics alone of the privilege of citizenship. Besides, the Jesuits would not hesitate to swear that they were not Catholics at all, but good Protestants. I know of one case of a doctor, an Irishman, who actually joined the Presbyterian church in Steubenville, but when in Pittsburgh or Cincinnati would be cheek by jowl with the priests there, would visit them at their monasteries and boast when he came home of the glorious time he had had living on the luxuries of the season and drinking wines and brandies of the best brands. Their oaths are nothing. They are absolved before they utter them. So I see no other way to check this mighty organization than refusing to naturalize any foreigner. This would be no check on the immigration of intelligent men. They would see that it was necessary for our self-protection, and know that their children would hav the blessed privilege of citizenship in the first and grandest republic in the world. But if we put this off for another decade, the serpent will be so coiled about the body of our republic that we may struggle in vain. JOHN DOWNES

MOODY, TEX., June 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Liberalism is growing, slowly but surely. The great corner-stone of Christianity—St. John—is gradually crumbling. The investigator, the reasoner, is taking the place of the theologian. Yet the theologian plays a big part in staying the march of progress. Who would think of investigating the Bible making one go crazy? A man by the name of Hamlin, a Freethinker, who is trying to do an activ part in the advancement of Freethought, was accused of making a woman by the name of Cruise go crazy. She, after forming his acquaintance, began visiting. Hamlin is well posted, and she began talking to him about the Bible, he, of course, getting the best of the bargain. Months passed on, and they still continued to argue whenever they met. She became interested in finding out what was in the Bible, going to him for information whenever needing. Still time passed on, and a few months ago the woman became crazy from some cause. Of course the few ignorant Christians said it was the influence of Infidelity that caused it, some threatening to take their guns and go and kill him—but they did not. Other threats were made, but none carried into effect. It has nearly all died out now, and the people are beginning to learn that education and investigation make no one go crazy.

Still the great battle between Christianity and Infidelity goes on. Everything the Christian can get against a Liberal is howled from the pulpit, until the entire ignorant world hears it. But still Liberalism grows. Every year, every month, every day, every hour, she grows grander and brighter. We see her light rising in the east and the west, the north and the south; and at last the torch of liberty will shine in all the world.

When Liberal Hall, of Waco, was burnt, the cry was made, "Good for the Infidels," "That's a warning for them." But still the Liberals took no belief in that; for the hall is going to be twice as big as before. And the convention to be held in July will be a great memorial of Freethought in Texas. JOHN M. SIMMONS.

PINEVILLE, KY., June 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I must thank you for the publication of my communication in your issue of the 14th, also for sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER for distribution. Your note following below my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER I must thank you for. We vote for the candidates to our constitutional convention at the coming August election. As soon after the election as it is possible for me to obtain the names of the candidates elected, I will send their names and addresses to you.

I left Coalton, Ky., for this place a few days ago. I boarded the train with an armful of back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER which I made use of in this novel way. Everywhere the postal clerk threw the mail off I threw a copy out of my window onto the mail bag. I had written my name and address on the margin of each paper, hoping that I would get some comments of the parties that got the papers, but as yet hav not. For a long time I hoarded the copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a miser does his gold, and it was a long time before I could persuade myself to giv them away, but after a long struggle I began the work. Knowing the need of Liberal educativ work as we do, subscribers should not hoard up their papers but pass them to their friends and neighbors. At first thought we may think it would do no good, but I know from experience that it will do good. If we look back at our own case the most of us will recollect that our first impressions of Freethought, disbelief or doubt in the so-called sacred writings, were not good. I can well remember how the Boston Investigator shocked my ideas when I read it the first time, and I thought it a very bad paper.

While in Lexington I visited the court house for the purpose of seeing Joel T. Hart's "Woman Triumphant." It is a beautiful piece of work, yet I could not help thinking how it would shock Anthony Comstock's modesty, notwithstanding many of the most refined ladies in this country hav contributed to the erection of this beautiful work. Neither are they ashamed to let the world know it, as their names are in a pamphlet suspended from the railing that surrounds the work. Anthony, you are so modest.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, S. P. HERRON.

WALTON, IND., June 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see that Brother Hacker is a little muddled about the meaning of Christian and Christianity. I do not know what kind of instruments of torture Christ used himself or whether any, but he says: "Bring hither those mine enemies that would not that I should rule over them and slay them before me" (see Luke xix, 20). To hav this order fulfilled would require the use of some kind of instruments, whether it be the gibbet, shotgun, or wheels. Now this order was given by Christ. So that the order given by him would be called "Christian," and the fulfillment of the order would be called Christianity. Here is another Christian (Christ's) order: "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and his sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (see Luke xiv, 26; xii, 49-53). Now, to fill these orders in good No. 1 style would be called Christianity. If Mr. Hacker will look around he can see these orders carried out in a good many families. I hav no respect for Christ, God, or anybody else that will use such language as the following: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth. I come not to send peace, but a sword. For I come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law, and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." You will find this language in Matt. x, 34-36. Now you can see that this is nothing more nor less than the dry-rot balderdash of Christianity.

Sometimes Christ appears to be in a contrary mood from the above, for he says: "If a man strike you on one cheek turn to him the other also." Sometimes he appears to be very benevolent. He says: "If a man asks for a coat giv him a cloak also." I hav heard drunkards talk about in some such manner as this. It might be that he (Christ) had imbibed too much of that wine which he manufactured from water at a certain wedding feast, that caused him to become so benevolent as to giv more than was asked for. Sometimes Christ tells lies, for he says: "Drink of any deadly poison and it shall not hurt you." Also, "Ask, and it shall be given, knock, and it shall be opened." "If you hav faith the size of a mustard seed you can remove a mountain." Now, if he had said that if you had a bank about the size of the public debt of the United States, it would hav sounded more like the truth, especially if the mountain was not too big.

Mr. Hacker says: "I hav long thought that we ought not to disgrace Christ even if he is a myth." A man that tells lies and has people slain before him, and disturbs the peace and quietude of whole families, I do not see how one could manage to "disgrace" such a fellow, whether he be a myth or a reality. Now for the grammatical declension, Christ, Christian, Christianity.

Blair and others are now trying to get bills through Congress on the principles of Christ, Christian, Christianity. If these men succeed in getting their bill through both houses of Congress, then you and I will be "brought hither and slain before me," or hoist the white flag. A la mode Harmon, Heywood, Bennett, Bruno, Hypatia, et al.

Here are Blair and his disciples, who would think no more of stabbing the vital principles of the Constitution of the United States for the principles of Christ, Christian, Christianity, than Freeman did of the vital principles of his little child when he dashed the butcher knife into its body for the principles of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Now this is what I call Blairism, or Christ, Christian, Christianity. In the state of Washington the school officers are determined to stab the constitution of the state or hav a fight, and all for the principles of Christ or Blairism to be taught in the common schools. The Liberals of that state hav got to fight for the principles of their constitution. Washington is a young state yet, and we of the older states should help them, as it will hav to be fought through the courts, and this kind of fighting takes money. I notice that when fighting has to be done with money the Christians are ahead of the Liberals. This should not be. Look at the editor of the American Sentinel, who is fighting Blairism vigorously. Is Freethought helping him as much as he deserves? Every Freethought person should subscribe for his paper. His address is, American Sentinel, 43 Bond street, New York. I take his paper. It knocks the persimmons from Blairism, or depraved Christ, Christian, Christianity. Although the editor is or calls himself a Christian, he is not affected with the dry rot yet. I think that he has too much sense to ever become affected with said disease. It is the ignorant that keep up this disease, so prevalent, and Talmage and the Blairs are inoculating the virus into the ignorant for the bread and butter that is in it. E. VAN BUSKIRK, M.D.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., June 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Every person who has an opinion of his or her own ought to freely express the same—to be outspoken and fearless. Unfortunately there are too many who for some cause do not freely express their conviction. The don't-care people compose a large number of those. To save my life I cannot reserve my opinion or keep in the background. No good cause ever triumphed by lukewarmness, cowardice, or indifference. The great cause of Universal Mental Liberty is a modern one. Millions of people do not commit themselvs one way or the other. A good many are wavering in belief but keep in the background of faith, or inactivity. This mighty contention between science and reason vs. religion and superstition is a battle that will never end, for the powers that be, Christianity, aristocracy, and wealth, are intrenched so advantageously and powerfully that it seems an impossibility to reverse the existing order of things. It is like trying to conquer fate. But, as I repeat again, it is the duty of all who are in sympathy with Freethought principles and mental liberty to become positiv in their views. All life is warfare. Science and Freethought is impartially devoted to finding the truth, whatever it may happen to be. Whether it brings comfort or despair cannot be helped. I am a Freethinker because I do not want to be humbugged by any promises of future bliss beyond this unequal and imperfect life. I hav to my satisfaction been convinced by bitter experience that fate is the God so long worshiped—fate, both cruel and kind, that rules our destiny. That the condition of mankind is deplorable is sadly true. The churches, Protestant and Catholic, in accord with the powers that be are humbugging the poor with counsel that they must be content to suffer and struggle for a bare living. Inequality is a beautiful idea with the churches and the existing order of things. The rich and influential, with the churches, are enslaving the poor. By this time hav even the masses become suspicious that there is a screw loose in the universe. They are suspecting that something is wrong. A few of the oppressed are getting their eyes open, but too many are so steeped in ignorance and superstition that they will never see the truth. Look at the rich church-members and their hypocrisy is only too plain. The Bible says it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man or woman to enter into heaven. Do the rich believe that admonition of holy writ. To a man they do not. They are wise and shrewd enough to make pretensions of their piety, but in reality are hypocrits. So the churches are teaching and humbugging millions, first by Bible promises, absurd claims of a God, and heaven and hell, unproved; second, by being in accord with those of power and wealth to hold in subjection and contentment the downtrodden classes; third, by enslaving all so foolish as to be enslaved. There is one consoling fact to Freethinkers—to know they set themselvs free from myth and tyranny. They alone know what sovereign individual liberty means. They know the uncertainty of the past, the terrible, cruel struggle of mankind. They know it is all in vain to look for a savior outside their own knowledge. They alone know how to analyze and sift the evidence impartially as it is revealed. They know that corroborated positiv testimony proves a fact beyond all doubt. They know and are wise enough to disbelieve what cannot be proved. They know the truth itself only can make us happy and free. Those now mentally free should certainly be radical in their convictions and therefore brave and fearless in this great reform movement in behalf of truth, happiness, and liberty as against superstition, royalty, aristocracy, and the powers that be.

This life is a failure because might makes right. Injustice often triumphs over justice. Slavery and oppression has been the curse of the world and is to-day. The toiling masses hav been unconscious of their enslaved condition all along, but time and intelligence are somewhat awakening them, and the most intelligent of them are beginning to suspect, and to suspect is the beginning of their emancipation. It is the unsuspecting and unwary who are always the victims of cruelty and wrong. Eternal vigilance is the price of all. The root of all evil is ignorance. Ignorance is the misfortune of the poor, and as one class oppresses the other it is no wonder millions hav their hell here. The Bible says, "The poor ye always hav with you;" charity then is a sweet virtue. But the person of Reason says if God's works are perfect there would be no necessity for charity, for all would be favored equally. Justice is sweeter than charity. One person has no more right than another to be favored with the blessings of this world, but as some are up in the world and others down it is plain there is something wrong. It is nonsense to say we are responsible for our condition in life. We are the creatures of circumstances. We hav no choice in our coming and going, but are born into a world where we are apt to be humbugged and wronged if eternal vigilance is absent. I ask any intelligent man or woman, Christians especially, how is it possible for all to be equal in life? Nature is partial and cruel. Some it favors with beauty, brightness, and strength; others just the reverse. The less favored cannot compete with the most favored. These are the odds against many, besides the circumstances and conditions surrounding them in the world. The great gulf between the rich and the poor is becoming greater. All find life worth the living, and as population increases the struggle for existence correspondingly increases. It is plain to me there is no hope for the wrongs of the oppressed in any condition of life only through Freethought principles. The churches are teaching everything is just and right, that all are favored equally, thanking God for life. Rather than one individual should be wronged, the world should perish. The rights of one are as sacred as the rights of billions. This is Freethought principle. THOS. J. CONNORS.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 22, 1890.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: Do you not observe the wily, villainous trickery of the fiendish Christians of the United States? May we not, by "looking backward" over the course of time, clearly behold the downright outrages that, pursuant to the "statutes" of their "God"—the same God which they now propose to establish in our Constitution of the United States, that so they may reënact those same statutes and reëstablish chattel slavery throughout this country—they perpetrated against humanity, and against the Constitution of the United States, in order to practice the fiendish statutes of their God.

Neither of the words slave, slavery, African, negro, black, mulatto, yellow, or white ever occupied a place in the Constitution of the United States until it was placed there after the inauguration of the Rebellion, and every clause of that great and solemn document which the lawyers and judges all along the entire line of the history of our government, so construed as to say that it meant slave and slavery, stands there and constitutes a part of that important document as it is this very day. Does it mean slave or slavery now?

By their villainous constructions of the Constitution of our United States they so distorted it as to hav it imply slaves and slavery, when all the while, and from the beginning of its existence, by that word "justice," in the preamble, and that word "people," in the fourth amendment of that Constitution, slavery was radically and thoroughly abolished everywhere under the flag. Was there ever any justice in slavery? None other than fiends will answer in the affirmativ! Were there any people in Africa before a white man had set foot upon their shores? None other than fiends will answer this in the negativ! That being the case, I am eminently right. Noah Webster says that "bondman" means "a man slave."

Now, I will show you as to how they are going to amend our Constitution of the United States, and, by its provisions, establish chattel slavery throughout North America. They may tell you now, that the thirteenth amendment will preclude the possibility of any such thing; but, the statutes of their God being above and superior to the laws of man, they will say that because of sin ("crime") against God, the people must serve in slavery; and in accordance with the thirteenth amendment as it now stands. They will, if we do not wake up, place their God in our Constitution; and the same God, too, that they say talks to us, in and by his statutes in Lev. xxv, 17, 18, 44, 45, 46: "But thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the Lord your God." "Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them." "Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen"—Freethinkers. "One who is unacquainted with the true God," says Webster—and that means me!—"that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids." "Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession." "And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession: they shall be your bondsmen forever" (Deut. xiv, 21). "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien." Oh, what a God! Turn him around here till I giv him a kick. All of Num. xxxi—too long to quote here; read it in the Bible. In Luke xix, 27: "But those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me." Upon this the Christian's fiendish Inquisition was founded, and on many other passages in their fiendish old Bible.

Having established that God in our Constitution of the United States, of course these barbarous statutes of this fiendish God must be carried out and executed to the letter, and not only the colored people must be sold into slavery—"bondage"—but also the poor white trash, and it will be legitimate and constitutional.

No man can read and understand our Constitution of the United States unless he has the Articles of Confederation at his elbow, or in his mind. The first clause of Article 6 of our Constitution provides thus: "All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation."

Since the framers of both of those great documents were more anxiously desirous to make this Union perpetual than they were to perfect any other part of it, they ridiculously, if possible, supererogated it in order that it might leave a lasting impression by constituting the very last words of the Articles of Confederation, thus: "And the Union shall be perpetual." Since that was the most important "engagement entered into," it is imperativ upon the United States to perpetuate this union; and whoever may be vested with power to enforce it, and neglects to do so, outrages the people by prostituting executiv powers to his own private villainous desires, and is a perjured, pitiable polluter.

Thanks to the wisdom of Dr. Franklin, that is just wherein he had all of the would-be destroyers of our Union hoodwinked, and upon their beam's end, so to speak! How careful he was not to say Articles of Confederation, lest they were to rake up and lay bare the point! It is evident that he did not intend that they, at that time, should observe it, lest they were to prevent its forming a part of our Constitution, and thus eventually lead to dismemberment. But it is evident that he did hope that, in the course of events, when occasion might require it, a clear and observing intellect—present company always suspected—might emerge from among the people, and, as clear as the noonday sun, point out the article and clause in the Constitution of the United States wherein it is expressly provided that "the Union shall be perpetual," and thus go on and perpetuate it.

If we permit the Jew's and Christian's God to occupy a place in our Constitution, he will kick about so terribly, as by reading the Bible we may see he did in days of yore, that he will knock it all into "smithereens." Petition your Congressmen to ward him off! G. N.

When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Fable.—The Mole and the Fox.

A mole that erst had often bent
His thoughts on nature's dark intent,
In leaving moles in gloom profound
And fruitless burrowing 'neath the ground,
Resolved one day, he scarce could see
How it were worth one's while to be.
A fox, with pious precepts stored,
The humble groundling's plaint o'erheard
Then. to rebuke the doubts expressed,
With holy zeal the mole addressed:
"I took," said he, "your narrow view
When I, friend mole, was blind like you
But, with superior vision blessed,
The wholesome truth now stands confessed
That all the ills encountered here
But for a better state prepare;
If this grand idea you repel.
You're an unregenerate Infidel."
Then spoke the mole: "I own, friend Fox,
Our views may both be orthodox,
And yet may vary—as we find
Among men, some are color blind:
To this man's vision that is seen
A blue which to another's green—
Shall this man 'gainst his brother rave
For differing views and call him knave?
You entertained the views I do,
Till light superior dawned on you;
Then without censure let me be Till a like change is wrought in me."

For Fourth of July.

ANNIE ISABEL WILLIS DESCRIBES SOME ENTERTAINING TABLEAUX.

They May Be Followed with an Exercise Known as "The Little Patriots," Which is Here Described—Full Directions Are Also Given.

Here are some suggestions which may be utilized by themselvs or given in connection with other exercises celebrating the "Glorious Fourth."

TABLEAU I.

The following may be recited by a boy who stands before a curtain, which should be drawn aside at each tableau:

This is the Fourth of July.
This is the boy who, with vigor and din,
Got out of bed early to help usher in
The glorious Fourth of July.

[The scene, beginning with the second line, shows on the stage a boy sitting in a great easy chair. His head should be bandaged, one eye being covered and his face well plastered; his right hand, bound up, should rest on a pillow. Beside him may be a table with numerous large bottles of liniment, etc.]

This is the cash that was squandered with joy
For cannon and powder by this lusty boy,
Who got up right early with vigor and din
To play his part bravely in ushering in
The glorious Fourth of July.

TABLEAU II.

[This tableau represents Ben and his father standing together. The latter is holding out some silver and greenbacks in his hand, and Ben, with a broad smile, is reaching out both hands to take the money.]

This is the cannon that went off too soon
And made the boy see both the stars and the moon;
'Twas bought with the money expended with joy
For crackers and powder and things by the boy,
Who with shouting and bustle and vigor and din
Got up mighty early to help usher in
The glorious Fourth of July.

[In this tableau Ben very smilingly stands near a large toy cannon, holding in his hands the things necessary to fire it off. In the background stands his mother, who has an expression of terror on her face and holds out both her hands, as if beseeching him not to play with the cannon.]

This is the bill that the doctors sent in
For stitches and plaster and medicin;
Result of the cannon that went off too soon
And made the boy see both the stars and the moon—
The boy who with bustle and vigor and din
Got up in the morning to help usher in
The glorious Fourth of July.

TABLEAU III.

[This scene represents Ben's father sitting by a table looking over the doctor's bill just sent in. It may be put with heavy, black writing on a sheet of legal cap paper and the father should hold it out at full length, with an astonished look on his face. Ben may be in the background, on a rocking-horse, or playing some indoor game.]

The next part of the exercises may be announced as "The Little Patriots," represented by as small boys and girls as can be taught to giv the quotations nicely. Let the boys carry flags and the girls wear sashes of red, white, and blue, passing over one shoulder and under the other arm. The scene represents an old man with a long beard and a suit of army blue sitting in an arm chair, leaning over with his chin on his cane, which both hands grasp. The children come in to martial music played by a band or on a piano. If neither can be had a drum will do. Let the performers execute a pretty march, if the size of the stage will permit, before grouping themselvs around the old man. If he sits facing the audience the children may arrange themselvs on either side, so that each can look both at him and at the audience. The old man, raising his head, says:

O darling little patriots,
So gay and full of life,
I'd spare you all the agony
That marks a nation's strife.
But if your country needs you
To help put down a wrong,
Stand ready at her faintest call—
Be brave and true and strong.

Then the following quotations on patriotism are given as numbered by the children.

I.

The United States is the only country with a known birthday. All the rest began they know not when, and grew into power they know not how. There is no "Republican," no "Democrat" on the Fourth of July—all are Americans, all feel that their country is greater than party.—James G. Blaine.

II.

Love of country is one of the loftiest virtues which the almighty has planted in the human heart. Patriotism knows neither latitude nor longitude. It is not climatic.—Emory A. Storrs.

III.

The man who loves home best, and loves it most unselfishly, loves his country best.—J. G. Holland.

IV.

Patriotism is trustful and simple, like family affection, and its subordinate place in the ordinary life of the nation is seen in the fact that it rarely shows itself except in the national emergencies.—J. G. Holland.

V.

That patriotism which, catching its inspiration from on high and leaving an immeasurable distance below all lesser, groveling, personal interests and feelings, animates and prompts to deeds of self-sacrifice, of valor, of devotion, and of death itself, that is public virtue; that is the noblest, the sublimest of all public virtues.—Henry Clay.

VI.

The love of country is universal. It has its seat deep down in the human heart. It strengthens with our years; is not weakened by distance, and we all feel the magnetism of its wondrous power.—John F. Dillon.

VII.

We cannot honor our country with too deep a reverence; we cannot love her with an affection too pure and fervent; we cannot serve her with an energy of purpose or a faithfulness of zeal too steadfast and ardent. —Grimke.

VIII.

A man's country is not a certain area of land—of mountains, rivers, and woods—but it is principle; and patriotism is loyalty to that principle.—G. W. Curtis.

The old man asks: "Cannot any of you repeat some stirring words about the bright banners which you held aloft so proudly just now?"

IX.

The American flag has been the symbol of liberty, and men rejoice in it. Not another flag on the globe has such an errand, or went forth upon the seas carrying everywhere, the world around, such hope for the captiv and such glorious tidings. The stars upon it were to the pining nations like the morning stars, and the stripes upon it were beams of morning light.—Henry Ward Beecher.

X.

Let us, then, twine each thread of the glorious tissue of our country's flag about our heartstrings, and looking upon our homes and catching the spirit that breathes upon us from the battle-fields of our fathers, let us resolve, come weal or woe, we will, in life and in death, now and forever, stand by the stars and stripes.—Henry Ward Beecher.

XI.

Though many and bright are the stars that appear
In the flag by our country unfurled,
And the stripes that are swelling in majesty there,
Like a rainbow adorning the world.
Their light is unsullied as those in the sky
By a deed that our fathers hav done,
And they're linked in as true and as holy a tie
In their motto of, "Many in One."

—G. W. Cutter.

XII.

Let this banner wave forever,
May its lustrous stars fade never
Till the stars shall pale on high;
While there's right the wrong defeating,
While there's hope in true hearts beating,
Truth and freedom shall not die.

As it floated long before us
Be it ever floating o'er us,
O'er our land from shore to shore;
There are freemen yet to wave it,
Millions who would die to save it,
Wave it, save it, evermore.

—Dexter Smith.

In conclusion the old man repeats, with upraised hand, these lines by Samuel L. Simpson:

Oh, bless the flag! let it float and fill
The sky with its beauty, our heartstrings thrill
To the low, sweet chant of its wind-swept bars,
And the chorus of all its clustered stars.
Embrace it, O mothers! and heroes shall grow
While its colors blush warm on your bosoms of snow.
Defend it, O fathers! there's no sweeter death
Than to float its fair folds with a soldier's last breath.
And love it, O children! be true to the sires
Who wove it in pain by the old campfires.

—Annie Isabel Willis.

A Home for Aged and Indigent Liberals.

Our friend Mr. J. Waters writes as follows, concerning a home for aged, infirm, and destitute Liberals:

"I was grieved to learn of the condition of the veterans Casey and Cook. Is it not time that Liberals exhibited liberality worthy of the name they bear by providing a home somewhere in this wide land for those who hav fallen by the wayside, wounded and disabled by the hand of persecution for truth's sake?

"All must know something of the vindictiv spirit with which men and women hav been pursued, who hav been true to their convictions of duty, and dared to oppose the popular fallacies of the times. Not a few hav been made to feel in some way the cruel hand of oppression. They hav been regarded with the evil eye of suspicion, ostracised, reputation injured by dark insinuations, business boycotted and ruined, and, in every way possible, the victim is made to feel the withering blight of prejudice and bigotry, and when he succumbs to the infamous load heaped upon him Superstition shakes its scrawny finger, and cries out, 'Behold the miserable end of the Infidel.'

"Liberals are accused of being heartless, cynical, critical, fault-finding iconoclasts, whose efforts are in the line of destruction rather than construction, and whose emotional natures are as dry as a desert, from whose arid depths no sigh of pity ever swells. These assertions are untrue, and Liberals should demonstrate their untruthfulness by tangible facts in the erection and support of an asylum for those who hav been brave and imprudent enough to stand up and be counted for justice to all men and equal rights and privileges for all men, and face the scorn and obloquy of enemies made thereby, who hav relentlessly pursued them until misfortune, marking them for its own, has brought them to a state of helpless dependence.

"To build monuments to the memory of those who hav died martyrs to Truth is well, and to build a sheltering home for helpless living heroes is also well. Liberals should do both and thus honor the principles they profess and the name they bear.

"You truly say that the children of your 'Corner' hav not the means to engage in large philanthropic enterprises; but can you not suggest some plan by which they can solicit ample means from those of mature years and larger means to set on foot something of the nature I hav suggested?"

A Short Lesson.

Discriminate in the use of the preposition of after the adverb off. Don't say: "Six yards of silk were cut off of that piece;" "The apples dropped off of that tree." Omit the of.

Be careful how you employ the words older and elder. Two or three examples will illustrate their use: "The elder son is the most gifted in the family; he is older than his brother by five years." "He is the older soldier of the two, and the oldest in the regiment." "He is the elder of the two poets, and the eldest poet in the realm."

Correspondence.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., June 12, E.M. 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 10th I saw that you wished me to take up the dime fund again, but I must say it would be impossible for me to do so, as I am learning my trade, and my time is wholly taken up.

I hope you will pardon me for not answering sooner, but THE TRUTH SEEKER has been away from home, and mother and I both hav been very sick.

I feel sorry for the old people, and perhaps some other young lady or gentleman would get up a dime fund. If they do, I will add my mite. So, wishing you and all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER success, I will close, remaining, as ever,

Yours in love, liberty, and truth,
SADIE THORPE.

OAK MILLS, KAN., June 18, E M. 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON, Kind Friend: As I hav a few leisure moments I will improve them by writing to you. Your article entitled "Corner Gospel," or "Earn What You Spend," in the last Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was very instructiv. Every boy and girl should read it very carefully, as it contains many things that would be of much importance to them. "Earn What You Spend" is a good motto, and those who heed its advice will never want for friends.

I just sent to Miss Elda S. Billings, Fabius, N. Y., for one of her pencil drawings. She must be an accomplished young lady. I read her letters to the Corner with much interest. They are well composed and are a credit to her. I agree with her in what she says about your books, and hope that every child in America may some day hav the opportunity to read them.

In the Corner of March 15, 1890, is a letter from Miss Mollie Randolph, and in that letter she corrects a mistake that I made in an article entitled "Nicknames of Noted Americans," in which I stated that James G. Blaine was given the title of the "Plumed Knight" during the Blaine-Cleveland campaign. I would like to say to the readers of the Corner that I made that statement unthoughtedly. I hav read Colonel Ingersoll's speech nominating Blaine for the presidency, and remember the sentence in which he spoke of Blaine as the "Plumed Knight," but when I wrote my article I did not think of the fact that it was at Cincinnati in 1876. Nevertheless, I wish to thank Miss Randolph for correcting my mistake, and whenever I make an uncorrect statement in the Corner, or anywhere that she may see it, I hope she will be quick to correct it. I am always ready to be corrected and always willing to take advice. I again thank Miss Randolph for her kindness.

Heston's cartoon, "Murder with Prayer," in the last TRUTH SEEKER, is a good one. His article on the same is very amusing, and I had to laugh when I read this extract: "If Christ was correct in his statement, we must believe that 'there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than there is over ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance,' and with this inspired promis before us, we hav no doubt that when God became aware of the tragedy on Cow Creek, and of Kirby's repentance right then and there, there was a great hullaballoo in heaven, and all the darling little angels twanged their harps and sang hosannas, and the four and twenty bald-headed elders who loaf around the foot of the throne shouted 'halleluiahs,' and the multitude of murderers and cutthroats who hav gone before cried out, 'Save a harp for Brother Kirby,'" etc. Mr. Heston is a "dandy." Who can estimate the amount of good he is doing? Long may he liv to hurl his sarcastic thunderbolts of argument against the boastful and haughty theologians, and place before their eyes his effectiv cartoons, that are already causing many to "open their eyes," and throw off the shackles that hav bound them down like serfs.

My letter is getting rather lengthy, so I will write no more at present. With best wishes to you and all the readers of the Corner, I remain,

Yours in the truth of Freethought,
GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Obituary.

On June 1st, Brother Jacob Brown, of East Penfield, N. Y., after a lingering illness, died He was a consistent Liberal, a prosperous farmer, and respectable citizen. He was a great reader, and for years had taken THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Brother Brown buried his wife a year ago. He had no children. His nearest relativs were nephews and nieces. He passed away with no fear of death, quietly, painlessly. He was a strong Materialist, but in the last few days of his life he thought much of his departed wife, and at times seemed to feel her presence.

He desired to be buried consistently with his views. His wishes were respected in this matter, and I was called upon to officiate.

The funeral was well attended, at his residence, Wednesday, June 4th, at 1 P.M.

The exercises commenced by my reading the little poem—one verse of which I giv—

When we lay us down to sleep
In some sad sweet day to be,
When the grasses wave and creep
Softly over you and me,
Who will miss our faces then,
Who of us sweet thoughts will keep,
In that happy moment when
We shall lay us down to sleep?

The introductory remarks were as follows:

The occasion of our meeting here is no unusual one—the day after the summons comes to call some friend, neighbor, or relativ from our midst.

The principal incidents in the life of Brother Brown are doubtless to most of you well known. He has spent his life in your midst. You are acquainted with his views. He believes in nothing supernatural. He lived for this world. He had no faith or hope of a hereafter. He had outgrown all superstition, and most earnestly desired to be buried consistently with his views of life and conditions existing after death. All must respect the sincerity, though they may differ from him.

Our brother believed in Freethought and the gospel of humanity—doing right because it is right, not for any hope of a reward hereafter or from any fear of punishment.

Who can estimate the influence of such a life? His work is done, I trust well done. He lived to a ripe old age. For seventy-nine years he has lived among you. His joys and sorrows are over. No more pleasure, no more pain. A brief address, and he who lies so silently before us will be carried to his last resting-place.

After the address, which was listened to with much interest, I read William Cullen Bryant's "Thanatopsis."

The concluding exercises were at the grave, five miles from his home, in Fairport cemetery. The grave was entirely lined with evergreens when the rich casket, with choice flowers, was lowered in it. I read the selection, "I am weary, lay me low," and concluded with these words: "Here in the bosom of earth we leave our brother. May we kindly cherish the memory of his many virtues, for humanity's sake. Rest in peace, our brother. Farewell, and forever." F. C. REYNOLDS.

Odds and Ends.

HE HAD SUBLIME FAITH.

The morning was beautiful. Dripping vines hung from the trees and the mullen stock had begun to hold up its fuzzy head. The buzzard sailed round and round, moving just the tips of his wings, and the peach-orchard shote, squealing as he went, trotted down the lane.

An old negro sat under a tree near a field. A planter came riding along.

"How are you, Sam?"

"Putty well, Mr. Henly; how is it wid yo'se'f?"

"All right, but why are you idling away your time this bright morning? Why ain't you plowing?"

"Wall, sah, I doan kere about it."

"Not sick, are you?"

"No, sah, ain't sick."

"Why, then, don't you go to work?"

"Case I jined the church las' night."

"What difference should that make?"

"Good deal o' diffunce, case I'se gwine try prar er while now. De Bible say, not by work less some pusson go er roun' an' brag er bout it, an' dar is a gre't miration made er bout prar, so I thought dat 'stead o' workin' dis year I would set in de shade an' pray. Tain't no trouble fur me ter pray, but I tell you what is er fact, 'sociatin' wid er mule out yander whar de sen scatters his smiles gits er man down. Been er workin' yere now fur er good many years, an' ain't got nothin' yit, an' I doan reckon prar widout work kin leave me much wus off den I is now. I'se gwine ter pray dat all dese weeds out dar draps down an' dies, an' dat de fines' cotton you eber seed springs up in dar place. Den I'se gwine ter pray dat de rain come when it is needed, an' den long in de fall I'll pray dat de cotton be picked an' ginned an' den sold, an' de money handed ober to me."

"Your faith is very beautiful, old man, but when fall comes and you find that you hav nothing to show but an enormous crop of weeds, you will find that your judgment was weak."

"Oh, I kain't he'p dat, Mr. Henly. De Bible an' de preachers tells me ter pray fur what I wants an' I gwine do it, an' if it doan turn out all right, w'y I kain't he'p it. As I said, I'se tried work an' it doan 'pear ter do no good, an' now I'se goin' ter try prar. Is you got some chawin' terbarker er bout you, Mr. Henly?"

"Why don't you pray for your tobacco, Sam?"

The old negro began to scratch his head.

"Wall, sah. I blebe I will, sense you speaks er bout it; an' while I'm at it I mout as well pray fur er right smart patch to spring up ober yander an' grow de same time dat the cotton does. Good mawnin', Mr. Henly, I musn't waste no mo' time fur de season is er creepin' er long an' I must be gettin' down ter my prayin'."

Several days later Henly saw old Sam sitting in front of his cabin eating something.

"Hello, old man, what are you eating?"

"I'se grindin' up er spring chicken, sah?"

"Where did you get it?"

"Well, sah, I wuz layin' yere on the bed las' night, er thinkin' whut wuz good ter eat. I ain't had much o' er appetite fur seberal days, fur I'se been so busy gettin' my prar crop in, an' all on er suddent I thought dat I would like ter hab er right young chicken. Den I prayed dat one would come an' I dozed off ter sleep. Putty soon I woke up an' yered suthin' scratchin', an' I looked up. I did, an' dar by de foot o' de bed er rakin' an' er clawin', wuz de fines' chicken you mighty nigh eber seed. He wuz so feered dat I wouldn't wake up dat he had dun pulled some o' de kiver offen me—dragged one sheet clar down ter de foot o' de bed. I got up powerful quick, I did, an' eben when I gunter put de water on ter scal' him he didn't run er way, but danced roun' like he mighty nigh tickled ter def; an', sah, you know whut dis chicken done?" the old fellow added, holding up a piece of the fowl, "why, he sung er tune while I wuz killin' him. He is de sweetes' meat I ever seed."

"You hav found, then, that praying pays?"

"In er measure, yas, sah. De weeds is still growin' powerful down yonder whar I wants de cotton, but da kaint stan' it much longer. Dar ain't no weed, sah, dat kin stan' up befo' prar. Some o' 'em is done scorched on de top, an' it ain't gwine be long fo' da falls down, an' den de cotton stalk will fling up its bloom an' shout hallelujah."

One night Henly heard a disturbance in his hog-pen. The moon was shining, and by creeping low on the ground Henly reached a point from which he could see all that was going on. It did not take him long to see enough. He saw old Sam throw a pig over the fence. Henly rushed upon the thief and seized him.

"Wall, fo' goodness, ef dis ain't Mr. Henly! W'y wut you doin' out dis time er night? You ketch yo' def o' col' ef you keep on', an den whut de folks o' dis 'munity gwine do?"

"Come on here, you old thief."

"W'y, whut you come call me er fief fur? Keep on dis way an' atter while I won't blebe dat you thinks I'se honest."

"You old scoundrel, I'll send you to the penitentiary."

"Who, me? Fur goodness sake, whut I done, Mars John?"

"You know. What are you doing with this pig?"

"Hol' on er minit. Dar's suthin' 'bout dis dat you doan understan'. I'll tell you how it is. Las' night my appertite commenced ter talk ter me er gin, an' the fust thing I knowed it wanted shote. I tole it ter keep still, dat I didn't wanter pray for shote case de Lawd wasn't much in favor o' haug meat no how, but it kep' on an' wouldn't gib me no rest. Den I got down on my knees an' axed de Lawd ter please, sah, gib me a little shote meat, but der prar wan't answered. Den I says: 'Lawd, ef you won't send de shote meat, won't you please tell my mind ter lead me ter whar I kin git some?' De Lawd done dat. He tole my mine, and de fust thing I knowed my mind say: 'Sam, go ober yander ter Mr. Henly's.' 'Look yere,' says I, 'doan sen' me ober dar, case I lubs dat man an' doan wanter take nothin' dat 'longs ter him.' My mind got mad den. 'Come yere,' it says, an' at de same time it gib me er jerk. 'Come yere an' go on ober yander an' git er shote, or I'll hurt you.' I wuz skeered, sah, case my mind neber acted dat way befo', an' then it jerked me 'gin—tore my collar, sah. See yere. Tore my collar, sho's you bo'n. Wall, I jes had ter go, fur I knowed dat de Lawd had dun tole my mind what ter do. So now yere I is, standin' right yere wid er man dat I has allus lubed, er cuzin' me o' stealin' er shote. Oh, I'se almos' er shamed o' you."

"That's all right. I'll lock you up until morning, and then I'll send you to jail."

"Whut, blamin' me fur whut de Lawd tole my mind ter make me do! Look yere, Mars John, ain't you jokin' wid me?"

"You'll find out when you go to the penitentiary."

"W'y, jest think er minit, man," the old negro pleaded; "jes look at de merics o' dis case. Ain't I showed you de proof, showed you whar my min' tore my collah? Lissun: I wanted de Lawd ter send me some shote', doan you understan', an' axed for it, an' de Lawd wouldn't sen' it ter me, but agreed ter tell my min' ter lead me ter it. Den my min' grabbed me an' fotch me ober yere. Dat's all dere is, an' is you gwine to hol' me 'sponsible fur dis?"

"Yes, to the extent of one year, at least."

"Well, sah, I ain't got no mo' ter say. No wonder de overflow comes an' de wind blows houses erway when de white folks 'sputes de will o' de Lawd. Suthin' awful gwine happen yer; mark my word ef dar ain't."—Opie P. Read.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Gems of Thought.

IF God inspired the writers of the Bible, it would also be necessary to the fulfillment of his purpose that he should superintend the compilation of its books by councils, its translation by scholars, and its interpretation by commentators. But the facts do not show that this has been done, as new versions would not be needed, nor would doctrinal quarrels exist.—Robt. C. Adams.

THE continually progressiv change to which the meaning of words is subject, the want of a universal language which renders translation necessary, the errors to which translations are again subject, the mistakes of copyists and printers, together with the possibility of willful alteration, are of themselvs evidences that the human language, whether in speech or in print, cannot be the vehicle of the word of God. The word of God exists in something else.—Paine.

SOONER or later the spirit of truth will be regarded in Christendom, as it was regarded by the philosophers of ancient Greece, as the loftiest form of virtue. We are, indeed, still far from that point. A love of truth that seriously resolves to spare no prejudice and accord no favor, that prides itself on basing every conclusion on reason or conscience, and on rejecting every illegitimate influence, is not common in one sex, is almost unknown in the other, and is very far indeed from being the actuating spirit of all who boast most loudly of their freedom from prejudice. Still it is to this that we are steadily approximating.—Lecky.

SAUL GOETH WITCH HUNTING.

And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men went with him, and they came to the woman by night: and he said, I pray thee, divine unto me by the familiar spirit, and bring me him up whom I shall name unto thee.—1 Sam. xxviii, 8.

IT would seem a truth irrefragable, that the search for each of these kinds of truth must be followed out on its own lines, by its own methods, to its own results, without any interference from investigators on other lines or by other methods. And it would also seem logical to work on in absolute confidence that whatever, at any moment, may seem to be the relativ positions of the two different bands of workers, they must at last come together, for Truth is one. But logic is not history. History is full of interferences which hav caused the earth dear. Strangest of all, some of the direst of them hav been made by the best of men, actuated by the purest motivs and seeking the noblest results. These interferences, and the struggle against them, make up the warfare of science.—Prof. A. D. White.

As for passing through any great and glorious experience, and rising above it, as an eagle might fly athwart the evening sky to rise into the still brighter and fairer regions of the heavens, I cannot say that I ever sailed so creditably but my bark ever seemed thwarted by some side wind, and went off over the edge, and now only occasionally tacks back toward the center of that sea again. I hav outgrown nothing good, but, I do not fear to say, fallen behind by whole continents of virtue, which should hav been passed as islands in my course; but I trust—what else can I trust—that, with a stiff wind, some Friday, when I hav thrown some of my cargo overboard, I may make up for all that distance lost.—Thoreau.

O BLEST, whom still the hope inspires
To lift himself from error's turbid flood!
—Goethe.

To those among us who hav made some progress in the study of moral philosophy, it is now, I presume, become sufficiently evident, that morality may exist independently of religious ideas; that the distinction between moral good and moral evil, the obligation to avoid evil and to cleave to that which is good, are laws as much acknowledged by man, in his proper nature, as the laws of logic; and which spring as much from a principle within him as in his actual life they find their application.—Guizot.

MORALITY is, like everything that man possesses, the outcome of a long series of acquirements handed down from generation to generation, and depends on definit natural and social conditions; it is therefore by no means the same eternally, but by its very nature it is a product of growth and a thing that changes—an expression of human knowledge, which proceeds and progresses with that knowledge itself. What we call "moral feeling" has its origin in the social instincts or habits which each human (or animal) society develops, and must develop, within itself, if it is not to perish by its own incapacity.—Buchner.

THE INFALLIBLE JUDGMENT OF THE MAJORITY—THE ARGUMENT OF NUMBERS.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Converted Catholic of this city says that "it is painfully true that former priests, and even converted priests, will receive ample compensation for their services in denouncing popery in all its phases, and especially if they speak of the immorality and wickedness of Jesuit priests and nuns, but they can starve if they try to preach the gospel to the Roman Catholics." The American Sentinel thinks this simply shows that the contest between Catholics and Protestants is no longer one of principle, but is simply a fight for advantage. This is further shown by the fact that Protestants are so ready to adopt Catholic methods and invoke the aid of the civil power to advance their interests.

THE Catholic American says: "The Nationalists are simply insane. They seem to desire the supplanting of almighty God and his ordinances by the divinity of the state." Without passing here upon the Nationalists, one way or other, we wish to hold up to opprobium this sentiment of the Catholic paper. If Catholics desire to discredit the Nationalists, they should do so upon grounds and proofs that their schemes are detrimental to the interests of the community. These are the only permissible grounds. This opposition to every change from the existent and the old, simply because it is a change, and denunciation of it as supplanting God's established order, is what has worked such incomputable harm throughout human annals.

THE Methodist Times of London says: "Nothing in the whole history of ecclesiastical Christianity is so indefensible and outrageous as the indifference with which the churches hav tolerated the long reign of militarism. Even now we hav apparently less sympathy with the prince of peace than Atheists, Socialists, and revolutionary Nihilists, who are never tired of denouncing war and pleading for a new era of universal brotherhood. It is impossible for Christian churches to repudiate responsibility for the existing condition of Europe. If we acted together, a European war would be impossible. If all the ministers of religion of the evangelical, Anglican, Latin, and Greek churches agreed to establish a 'truce of God,' neither the German emperor, nor the czar, nor anybody else, could move a regiment."

THE Pittsburgh Christian Advocate voices the feeling of all the friends of pronounced Christian principles in civil government, comments the Christian Statesman, when it says: "We confess to very great disappointment in the religious features of President Harrison's administration. He is a Christian man, an officer and for years a Sabbath-school teacher in the Presbyterian church. Much was expected of him in the way of proper example in his high office, and of respect for the Christian principles and sentiment of the country. But in some respects we hav not seen them. Intoxicating liquors hav been served on his table on state occasions, and lately a 'german,' one of the most offensiv and disgusting of all the public dances, was given in the White House. It was a full dress (rather undress) affair, such as but few thoughtful mothers would suffer their daughters to attend. Chaplain Milburn says there has not been any such public exhibition in the presidential mansion since the marriage of President Tyler. Pretty soon the people will wonder what the difference is between a Christian president and one who is not a Christian."

THE retrogressiv character of Emperor William's obtrusiv assertion of his claim of divine right, provokes comment. A London writer thus contrasts the spectacle of the Paris Exposition that was held to celebrate the overthrow of divine and other monarchism, with that presented by this young German bigot: "In June, 1888, workmen were toiling in the Champ de Mars upon the foundations of a noble exhibition, planned to celebrate the centenary of the death by violence of the Divine Right of Kings, and four thousand miles westward, in the city of Chicago, national delegates were assembled to select the twenty-third president of a great republic, which also stood upon the threshold of its hundredth birthday. These were both suggestiv facts, full of hopeful and inspiring thoughts to the serious mind. Taken by themselvs they seem very eloquent proofs of the progress which Liberty, Enlightenment, the Rights of Man, and other admirable abstractions spelled with capital letters, had made during the century. But unfortunately, history will not take them by themselvs. That same June of 1888 witnessed a spectacle of quite another sort in a third large city—a spectacle which gave the lie direct to everything that Paris and Chicago seemed to say. This sharp and clamorous note of contradiction came from Berlin, where a helmeted and crimson-cloaked young man, still in his thirtieth year, stood erect on a throne, surrounded by the bowing forms of twenty ruling sovereigns, and proclaimed with the harsh, peremptory voice of a drill sergeant, that he was a War Lord, a Mailed Hand of Providence, and a sovereign specially conceived, created, and invested with power by God, for the personal government of some fifty millions of people."

THERE is a child's paper published in the interests of the Catholic parochial schools called the Catholic Youth. We quote from it: "Catholic parents should not be induced to send their children to the public schools for the reason that they are acquainted with some of the principals or teachers of these schools and think them to be good Catholics, who will see that their children's religion will not be interfered with while they are under their charge. The reason is a bad one; the principals and teachers in the public schools may be Catholics, but they are forbidden to teach religion of any kind to their scholars. Therefore, the Catholic children might as well be under the care of Protestant, Jew, or Infidel teachers. Some of the Catholic teachers in the public schools are so zealous in their business that they travel around their school district and try to induce Catholic parents to take their children from Catholic schools and send them to the public schools. Their motiv in doing this is to keep their classes well filled so as not to lose their place as teachers, or not lose their reputation for good attendance in the different classes. They are looking out not for worldly interests, and Catholic parents should pay no heed to their solicitations. As for the Catholicity of such teachers, it must be at a low ebb, because they are working in direct opposition to the laws of the Catholic church, in which they claim a membership."

SOME CHURCH DOCUMENTS.

SENTENCE AND ABJURATION OF GALILEO.

Sentence of the Tribunal of the Supreme Inquisition against Galileo Galilei, given the 22d day of June of the year 1633.

We, Gasparo of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, Borgia;
Brother Felice Centino of S. Anastasia, called Ascoli;
Guido of Santa Maria del Popolo, Bentivoglio;
Brother Desiderio Scaglia of S. Carlo, called of Cremona;
Brother Antonio Barberino, called of S. Onofrio;
Laudivio Zacchia, of S. Pietro in Vincoli, called of San Sisto;
Berlingero of S. Agastino, Gessi;
Fabricio of S. Vincenzo in pane e perna, Verospi;
Francisco di S. Lorenzo in Damaso, Barberino;
Marzio di Santa Maria Nuova, Ginetti.

By mercy of God Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, Inquisitors of the Holy Apostolic See, in the whole Christian Republic specially deputed against heretical depravity:

It being the case that thou, Galileo, son of the late Vincenzio Galilei, a Florentine, now aged seventy, wast denounced in this Holy office in 1615:

That thou heldest as true the false doctrin taught by many, that the Sun was the center of the universe and immovable, and that the Earth moved, and had also a diurnal motion. That on this same matter thou didst hold a correspondence with certain German mathematicians: That thou hadst caused to be printed certain letters entitled On the Solar Spots, in the which thou didst explain the said doctrin to be true; And that, to the objections put forth to thee at various times, based on and drawn from Holy Scripture, thou didst answer, commenting upon and explaining the said Scripture after thy own fashion: And thereupon following was presented (to this tribunal) a copy of a writing in form of a letter, which was said to hav been written by thee to such an one, at one time thy disciple, in which, following the position of Copernicus, are contained various propositions contrary to the true sense and authority of the Holy Scripture:

This Holy Tribunal desiring to obviate the disorder and mischief which had resulted from this, and which was constantly increasing to the prejudice of the Holy Faith; by order of our Lord (Pope) and of the most eminent Lords Cardinal of this Supreme and Universal Inquisition, the two propositions of the stability of the Sun and of the motion of the Earth were by the qualified theologians thus adjudged:

That the Sun is the center of the universe, and doth not move from his place is a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and formally heretical; being expressly contrary to Holy Writ: That the Earth is not the center of the universe nor immoveable, but that it moves, even with a diurnal motion, is likewise a proposition absurd and false in philosophy, and considered in theology ad minus erroneous in faith.

But being willing at that time to proceed with leniency toward thee, it was decreed in the Sacred Congregation held before our Lord (Pope) on the 25th of February, 1616, that the most eminent Lord Cardinal Bellarmine should order thee, that thou shouldst entirely leave and reject the said doctrin, and that thou wast neither to teach it to others, nor to hold and defend it, to which precept, if thou didst not giv heed, thou wast to be imprisoned: and on execution of the said decree, the following day in the palace and in the presence of the said most Eminent Lord Cardinal Bellarmine, after having been advised and admonished benignantly by the said Lord Cardinal, thou didst receive a precept from the then Father Commissary of the Holy Office in the presence of a notary and witnesses, that thou shouldst entirely abandon the said false opinion, and for the future neither uphold nor teach it in any manner whatever, either orally or in writing; and having promised obedience, thou wast dismissed.

And to the end that this pernicious doctrin might be rooted out and prevented from spreading, to the grave prejudice of Catholic truth, a decree was issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Index, prohibiting books which treated of the said doctrin, which was declared to be false and entirely contrary to Holy Scripture.

And there having lately appeared here a book printed in Florence this past year, whose superscription showeth thyself to be the author, the title being: Dialog of Galileo Galilei on the Two Great Systems of the World, the Ptolemaic and the Copernican: and the Sacred Congregation having been informed that in consequence of the said book the false opinion of the mobility of the earth and the stability of the sun was daily gaining ground; the said book was diligently examined, and was found openly to transgress the precept which had been made to thee, for that thou in the said book hadst defended the said already condemned opinion, which had been declared false before thy face; whereas thou in the said book by means of various subterfuges dost endeavor to persuade thyself that thou dost leave it undecided and merely probable. The which however is a most grave error, since in no way can an opinion be probable which has been declared and defined to be contrary to Holy Scripture.

Wherefore by our order thou wast cited before this Holy Office, in which being examined upon oath, thou didst acknowledge thyself to hav written and caused to be printed the said book. Thou didst confess that, ten or twelve years previously, after having received the precept above mentioned, thou didst begin to write the said book; that thou didst ask for a license to print it, without signifying to those from whom thou didst receive such license, that thou hadst a precept forbidding thee to hold, defend, or teach in any way whatever such doctrin.

Thou didst likewise confess, that the said book is in more places than one so written that the reader might form an idea that the arguments brought forward in favor of the false opinion were pronounced in such guise that by their efficacy they were more apt to convince than easy to be overturned; excusing thyself for having fallen into an error so alien, sayest thou, to thy intention, for that thou hadst written in form of a dialog, and for the natural complacence with which each one doth view his own subtlety in showing himself more acute than the common herd of men, in finding even for false propositions ingenious discourse to make them apparently probable.

And a convenient period having been assigned thee for thy defense, thou didst produce a certificate written by the hand of the most eminent Lord Cardinal Bellarmine, procured by thee, as thou saidst, for the purpose of defending thyself from the calumnies of thy enemies, who had said that thou hadst abjured and hadst been punished by the Holy office. In the which certificate it is written that thou hadst not abjured, neither hadst thou been subjected to punishment, but that only the declaration made by Our Lord (Pope) and published by the Sacred Congregation of the Index had been made known to thee, the which contains that the doctrin of the Earth's motion and of the stability of the sun is contrary to Holy Scripture, and may therefore neither be defended nor held: and that whereas in the said certificate no mention was made of two particulars of the precept, to wit, docere and quovis modo, it was to be thought that in the course of fourteen or sixteen years thou hadst lost all remembrance of it; and that for this same reason thou hadst been silent respecting the precept when thou didst ask for license to print the said book. And all this thou saidst not to excuse thy error, but that it might be attributed to a vain ambition rather than to malicious intent. But from the said precept produced in thy defense, thou hast aggravated thy faults; whereas, the said opinion being therein declared contrary to Holy Writ, thou hast nevertheless dared to treat of it, to defend it, and to persuade that it was probable; nor doth justify thee the license which thou didst extort with craft and cunning, not having notified the precept which had been given thee.

And, as it appeared to Us that thou hadst not said the whole truth concerning thy intention, we judged it to be necessary to proceed to the vigorous examination of thee, in which (without prejudice to any of the things confessed by thee, or deduced against thee, as above, respecting thy said intention, thou answeredst like a good Catholic. Therefore, having seen and maturely considered the merits of thy case, with thy above-mentioned confessions and excuses, We hav adjudged against thee the herein-written definit sentence.

Invoking then the Most Holy Name of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and of His Most glorious Mother Mary, ever Virgin, for this Our definit sentence, the which sitting pro tribunali, by the counsel and opinion of the Reverend Masters of theology and doctors of both laws, Our Counselors, we present in these writings, in the cause and causes currently before Us, between the magnificent Carlo Sinceri, doctor of both laws, procurator fiscal of this Holy Office on the one part, and thou Galileo Galilei, guilty, here present, confessed and judged, on the other part:

We say, pronounce, sentence, and declare, that thou, the said Galileo, by the things deduced during this trial, and by thee confessed as above, hath rendered thyself vehemently suspected of heresy by this Holy Office, that is, of having believed and held a doctrin which is false, and contrary to the Holy Scriptures, to wit: that the Sun is the center of the universe, and that it does not move from east to west, and that the Earth moves and is not the center of the universe: and that an opinion may be held and defended as probable after having been declared and defined as contrary to Holy Scripture; and in consequence thou hast incurred all the censures and penalties of the Sacred Canons, and other decrees both general and particular, against such offenders imposed and promulgated. From the which We are content that thou shouldst be absolved if, first of all, with a sincere heart and unfeigned faith, thou dost before Us abjure, curse, and detest the abovementioned errors and heresies, and any other error and heresy contrary to the Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church, after the manner that We shall require of thee.

And to the end that this thy grave error and transgression remain not entirely unpunished, and that thou mayest be more cautious for the future, and an example to others to abstain from and avoid similar offenses, We order that by a public edict the book of Dialogs of Galileo Galilei be prohibited, and we condemn thee to the prison of this Holy Office during Our will and pleasure; and as a salutary penance We enjoin on thee that for the space of three years thou shalt recite once a week the Seven Penitential Psalms, reserving to Ourselvs the faculty of moderating, changing, or taking from, all or part of the above-mentioned pains and penalties.

And thus We say, pronounce, declare, order, condemn, and reserve in this and in any other better way and form which by right We can and ought.

M. Cardinalis Ginettus.

THE ABJURATION OF GALILEO.

I, Galileo Galilei, son of the late Vincent Galileo, a Florentine, of the age of seventy, appearing personally in judgment, and being on my knees in the presence of you, most eminent and most reverend Lords, Cardinals of the Universal christian Commonwealth, Inquisitors General against heretical depravity, having before my eyes the holy gospels, on which I now lay my hands, swear that I always believed, and now believe, and, God helping, that I shall for the future always believe whatever the holy catholic and apostolic Roman church holds, preaches, and teaches. But because this holy office had enjoined me by precept, entirely to relinquish the false dogma, which maintains that the sun is the center of the world and immovable, and that the earth is not the center and moves—nor to hold, defend, and teach by any means, or by writing, the aforesaid false doctrin—and after it had been notified to me, that the aforesaid doctrin is repugnant to the holy scripture, I hav written and printed a book in which I treat of the same doctrin already condemned, and adduced reasons with great efficacy in favor of it, not offering any solution of them; therefore I hav been adjudged and vehemently suspected of heresy—namely, that I maintained and believed, that the sun is the center of the world, and immovable, and that the earth is not the center, and moves.

Therefore, being willing to take out of the minds of your eminences, and of every catholic christian this vehement suspicion, of right conceived against me, I, with sincere heart and faith unfeigned, abjure, execrate, and detest the above said errors and heresies, and generally every other error and sect contrary to the above said holy church; and I swear that I will never any more hereafter say or assert, by speech or writing, anything through which the like suspicion may be had of me—but if I shall know any one heretical, or suspected of heresy, I will denounce him to this holy office, or to the inquisitors and ordinary of the place in which I shall be. I moreover swear and promis, that I will fulfill and observe entirely all the penitences which hav been imposed upon me, or which shall be imposed by this holy office. But if it shall happen, that I shall go contrary (which God avert) to any of my words, promises, protestations, and oaths, I subject myself to all the penalties and punishment, which by the holy canons and other constitutions, general and particular, hav been enacted and promulgated against such delinquents—So help me God, and his holy Gospels on which I now lay my hands.

I, the aforesaid Galileo Galilei, hav abjured, sworn, promised, and hav bound myself as above, and in the fidelity of those with my own hands, and hav subscribed to this present writing of my abjuration, which I hav recited word by word. At Rome in the convent of Minerva, this 22d day of June, of the year 1633.

I, GALILEO GALILEI, hav abjured as above with my own hand.

THE PULPIT ON WITCHCRAFT IN AMERICA.

REV. COTTON MATHER'S EXHORTATION WHICH PRODUCED THE MASSACHUSETTS EXECUTIONS.

These witches . . . hav met in hellish randezvouszes. . . . In these hellish meetings, these monsters hav associated themselvs to do no less a thing than to destroy the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ in these parts of the World. . . . We are truly come into a day which, by being well managed, might be very glorious, for the exterminating of those accursed things. . . . Consider, also, the misery of them whom witchcraft may be let loose upon. What is it to fall into the hands of devils? Oh, what a direful thing it is, to be prickt with pins, and stab'd with knives all over, and to be fill'd all over with broken bones? 'Tis impossible to reckon up the varieties of miseries which those monsters inflict where they can hav a blow. No less than death, and that a languishing and a terrible death will satisfie the rage of those formidable dragons.

PROSLAVERY DECISIONS OF AMERICAN CHURCHES.

CLERGY OF RICHMOND, VA., JULY 29, 1835.

Resolved, That we earnestly deprecate the unwarrantable and highly improper interference of the people of any other state with the domestic relations of master and slave.

That the example of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles, in not interfering with the question of slavery, but uniformly recognizing the relations of master and servant, and giving full and affectionate instruction to both, is worthy of the imitation of all ministers of the gospel.

That we will not patronize nor receive any pamphlet or newspaper of the antislavery societies, and that we will discountenance the circulation of all such papers in the community.

That the suspicions which hav prevailed to a considerable extent against ministers of the gospel and professors of religion in the state of Virginia, as identified with Abolitionists, are wholly unmerited, believing as we do, from extensiv acquaintance with our churches and brethren, that they are unanimous in opposing the pernicious schemes of Abolitionists.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

General Conference, 1836.

1. Resolved, By the delegates of the annual conference in general conference assembled, that they disapprove in the most unqualified sense, the conduct of the two members of the general conference who are reported to hav lectured in this city recently, upon, and in favor of, modern Abolitionism.

2. Resolved, By the delegates of the annual conferences in general conference assembled, that they are decidedly opposed to modern Abolitionism, and wholly disclaim any right, wish, or intention to interfere in the civil and political relation between master and slave as it exists in the slaveholding states of this Union.

Ohio Conference, 1836.

1. Resolved, That we deeply regret the proceedings of the Abolitionists and antislavery societies in the free states, and the consequent excitement produced thereby in the slave states; that we, as a conference, disclaim all connection and coöperation with or belief in the same; and that we hereby recommend to our junior preachers, local brethren, and private members within our bounds to abstain from any connection with them, or participation of their acts in the premises whatever.

2. Resolved, That those brethren and citizens of the North who resist the Abolition movements with firmness and moderation, are the true friends to the church, to the slaves of the South, and to the constitution of our common country, etc.

New York Conference, 1836.

1. Resolved, That this conference fully concur in the advice of the late general conference, as expressed in their pastoral address.

2. Resolved, That we disapprove of the members of this conference patronizing or in any way giving countenance to a paper called Zion's Watchman,* because in our opinion it tends to disturb the peace and harmony of the body by sowing dissensions in the church.

Georgia Conference.

Resolved unanimously that, Whereas, there is a clause in the disciplin of our church, which states that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery; and whereas the said clause has been perverted by some, and used in such a manner as to produce the impression that the Methodist Episcopal church believed slavery to be a moral evil.

Therefore, Resolved, That it is the sense of the Georgia annual conference that slavery, as it exists in the United States, is not a moral evil.

Resolved, That we view slavery as a civil and domestic institution, and one with which, as ministers of Christ, we hav nothing to do, further than to ameliorate the condition of the slave by endeavoring to impart to him and his master the benign influences of the religion of Christ, and aiding both on their way to heaven.

That the Georgia annual conference regard with feelings of profound respect and approbation the dignified course pursued by our several superintendents or bishops in suppressing the attempts that hav been made by various individuals to get up and protract an excitement in the churches and country on the subject of abolitionism.

Resolved, further, That they shall hav our cordial and zealous support in sustaining them in the ground they hav taken.

South Carolina Conference.

We hold that the subject of slavery in these United States is not one proper for the action of the church, but is exclusivly appropriate to the civil authorities.

BAPTIST CHURCH.

Memorial addressed by Charleston Baptist Association to Legislature of South Carolina, 1835.

The undersigned would further represent, that the said association does not consider that the holy scriptures hav made the fact of slavery a question of morals at all. The Divine Author of our holy religion, in particular, found slavery a part of the existing institutions of society; with which, if not sinful, it was not his design to intermeddle, but to leave them entirely to the control of men. Adopting this, therefore, as one of the allowed arrangements of society, he made it the province of his religion only to prescribe the reciprocal duties of the relation. . . . The right of masters to dispose of the time of their slaves has been distinctly recognized by the Creator of all things.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, 1836.

Committee's report to General Assembly, 1835—

That after the most mature deliberation, which they hav been able to bestow on the interesting and important question referred to them, they would most respectfully recommend to the General Assembly, the adoption of the following preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, The subject of slavery is inseparably connected with the laws of many of the states of this Union, with which it is by no means proper for an ecclesiastical judicature to interfere, and involves many considerations in regard to which great diversity of opinion and intensity of feeling, are known to exist in the churches represented in this Assembly: . . .

Resolved, 1. That it is not expedient for the Assembly to take any further order in relation to this subject.

Taxation of Church Property.

The following is a letter from C. B. Reynolds, secretary of the Washington Secular Union, to Governor Ferry, announcing the non-assessment of church property by the assessors of the state, and urging the governor to insist on their prompt compliance with the constitution:

WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION,
2105 SIXTH STREET, SEATTLE, WASH., June 26, 1890.

HON ELISHA P. FERRY, Governor of the State of Washington, Dear Sir: The board of directors of the Washington Secular Union would respectfully call your attention to the fact that James A. Garfield said in Congress, June 22, 1874:

The divorce of state and church ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation, for if you exempt the property of any church organization to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community.

Gen. U. S. Grant, in his message of 1875, wrote:

In connection with this important question I would call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil, that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850 I believe the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to $87,000,000. In 1860 the amount was doubled. In 1870 it was $353,483,587. By 1890, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding three billions. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who hav to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations—religious or otherwise—allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The accumulation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally.

In harmony with these admonitions, founded on wisdom, justice, and true patriotism, the framers of our state constitution provided:

Art. i, Sec. 11. No public money or property shall be appropriated to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment.

We appeal to you, would not exemption of any church property from taxation be to appropriate and apply the amount of the taxes that should be paid by the owners of said property to the support of that church or religious establishment?

Is not such exemption repugnant to, and a violation alike of the letter and spirit of, the constitution?

Art. vii, Sec. 1. All property in the state not exempt under the law of the United States or under this constitution shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law.

Is not this provision peremptory, and of immediate effect? Had the territorial law exempted all iron-workers from taxation, would there be a shadow of doubt in any sane mind that on the adoption of this constitution all such exemptions ceased?

Would it hav been pretended that the territorial law exempting iron-workers held good for another year, despite the provisions of the state constitution?

Would not such unjust discrimination, preference, and appropriation of public money by the exemption of certain corporations who dealt in iron over all other property-owners be self-evidently repugnant to the constitution?

Art. vii, Sec. 2. The legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state according to its value in money, and shall prescribe such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion of the value of his, her, or its property.

Art. xxvii, Sec. 2. All laws now in force in the territory of Washington which are not repugnant to this constitution shall remain in force until they expire of their own limitation or are altered or repealed by the legislature.

All property in the state, every person and corporation, shall pay tax. The territorial law exempting church property to the value of $5,000 is repugnant to the just and equitable provisions of this constitution, and, by Article xxvii, Section 2, is therefore made void and of non-effect.

Art. xxvii, Sec. 2. Provided further, that the property of the United States, and of the state, counties, school districts and other municipal corporations, and such other property as the legislature may by general law provide, shall be exempt from taxation.

No church property has been so exempted, but on the contrary the legislature passed "An act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington" (page 606 of session laws of 1889–90), in exact harmony with the letter and spirit of the constitution in Section 5 of said act enumerating property that shall be exempt from taxation, rightfully and justly omitting exemption of any church, private school, or hospital property—other than public schools and county hospitals. And Section 48 of said act provides,

That all property shall be assessed at its true and fair value in money. In determining the true and fair value of real and personal property the assessor shall not adopt a lower or different standard of value because the same is to serve as a basis of taxation.

And in Section 154 of said act,

All laws and parts of laws heretofore enacted upon any of the subjects in this act provided for be, and the same are hereby repealed.

Thus the territorial law exempting church property from taxation unless of greater value than $5,000 is repealed, rendered nugatory and of none effect—

First, by the plain and unmistakable provisions of the constitution as herein quoted.

Secondly, by the act of the legislature herein referred to, the which became the law of the state and of binding force and effect at the expiration of ninety days from the adjournment of the legislature, to-wit, this 26th day of June, 1890.

The secretary of the Washington Secular Union has made special inquiries in different parts of the state, and from other reliable information the board of directors of the Washington Secular Union verily believe that very many auditors and assessors throughout the state are acting as though the territory law exempting church property to the value of $5,000 was still of binding force and effect, and willfully or in ignorance are ignoring the requirements of the constitution.

Therefore, the officers and members of the Washington Secular Union respectfully appeal to you as governor of the state, that in compliance with Article iii, Section 5, of the constitution, and an act of the legislature (p. 64, session laws 1889–90) entitled, "An act relating to the duties of the governor," Section 1, first—to supervise the conduct of all executiv and municipal officers; second—to see that all offices are filled, and the duties therefor performed, you will immediately issue instructions to the auditors and assessors throughout the state that whenever, in any part of the state, church property has not been equitably assessed at the same ratio as the adjoining property—as the constitution provides—they proceed forthwith to assess such property, and to enter or cause the same to be entered on the assessment roll of their respectiv districts or precincts, the same as they would do on discovery that any other property had willfully by negligence or design been omitted, passed over, or not entered on the assessment roll for taxation.

The Washington Secular Union does not attack the rights of the church when insisting upon the just taxation of its property, but simply claims obedience to the provisions of the constitution, and justice to the people, and is but heeding the admonitions of the distinguished statesmen, Gen. U. S. Grant and James A. Garfield.

The exemption of church property to the value of $5,000 has resulted in dishonesty of assessors and connivance at evasion of the law for pecuniary gain by some of our most wealthy churches. Although there are quite a number of churches in the state valued at from $10,000 to $60,000, examination of the assessment rolls shows very, very few assessed at over $4 000. Thus the revenue of the territory has been defrauded, and the burden of honest taxpayers made heavier.

Trusting your prompt action will avoid appeals to the various county boards of equalization, with fierce contentions, dissensions, and appeals to the courts,

Respectfully your obedient servant,

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Sec. Washington Secular Union.

Eminent Women.

GEORGE SAND.

The name of George Sand has been familiar to most of us for generations, and there are yet few of her admirers who know her by her real name, Amantine Lucile Aurore Dupin. She was born in the province of Berry, France, in 1804. Her father's family was an old and very aristocratic one. He displeased his proud mother by marrying a tradesman's daughter. He was killed at thirty years of age by a fall from a horse, leaving four children—three boys and Aurore—with but little means to support them. His mother offered to take charge of her son's children if their mother would giv up all claim on them. The widow would not giv up her boys, but as she was poor and had to work for a living, she sent the baby, Aurore, to her grandmother, who adopted her and kept her while she lived. The grandmother was a woman of strong character, proud and aristocratic, and her few friends were like herself—people of her own age and devoted to learning, mind, and character, so the little girl had a lonely time of it, and all her associations were of a nature far beyond her age. The books, the talk, the employments, and enjoyments of the old lady and her friends were all unsuited to her age and temperament.

So she wandered off in the fields and woods that surrounded the stately, gloomy home, finding in nature and in horseback ridings her highest pleasures, and "looking directly and lovingly into the face of nature, she learned the secrets which skies and water, fields and lanes, can teach the heart that loves them."

With her intense, passionate disposition, and a heart craving love, it is no wonder she secretly hated the aristocratic, domineering spirit of caste, which cut her off from the society she would hav enjoyed.

Aurore, though cut off from genial companionship, was by no means neglected educationally. She had the best teachers in all things fitting her station.

Madam Dupin, the grandmother, was an admirer of Rousseau, and Aurore listened eagerly to the conversations, which helped to make her a revolutionist, and though but a child she read the works of Rousseau with enthusiasm, and peopled her little world with heroes modeled from such sources.

At fifteen she was sent to a convent in Paris to finish her education, and grew devout and pious. Charmed with the seeming peace and quiet of the sisters, all so different from her wild, restless, vehement character, she wished to become a novice, but was finally persuaded by the sisters and her confessor to wait awhile, as her relativs would be so opposed to it. She consented, and the feeling naturally wore off, and "Sainte Aurore" was the life and soul of all the recreations allowed in the convent, which included even theatrical performances.

When about sixteen her grandmother died and she became heiress of the Dupin property, and then she sent word for her mother to come and liv with her. Though she had always longed for her mother, she found after she came that they were very uncongenial in tastes and pursuits. Aurore was an aristocrat by training and habits—though in theory a daughter of the people—so there was no real sympathy of feeling between them. Finally Aurore determined to try marriage as a road to freedom, and she became Madam Dudevant. The husband was twenty-seven and an officer in the imperial army, and of good standing and character.

"The mother was glad to be thus happily rid of the care of this unmanageable and eccentric daughter, while she hoped the joys and cares of wifehood would tone down the too exuberant nature."

M. Dudevant was dogmatic, commonplace, dull, and uninteresting. "He walked always on life's levels; the hights and depths were to him undiscoverable. To a woman like himself he would hav made a model husband; to a woman of George Sand's keen sensibilities, impassioned and impulsiv nature, life with this stolid, matter-of-fact man became a series of battles against trivialities and pettiness which soon became too hard to be borne."

We all know that while great trials may be met with firmness and fortitude, small worries and little continual aggravations wear out the best of resolutions. They separated by mutual consent when she was twenty-four years old. She kept his two children, and was the most devoted of mothers.

She found it hard to liv on her small income. She tried painting, and then turned to literature.

She had a friend—some said a lover—Jules Sandeau. The two friends wrote some novelets in conjunction with one another under the name of "Jules Sand," and hence originated the idea of her adopted name, George Sand, as it was thought then no woman could win fame and money as a writer, and her mind being strong and forcible, her works were as eminently masculin as feminin, thus proving there is no sex in mind.

Hard and laborious as her labors now became, she was happy because free.

She shocked society by many innovations of word and deed, and even went so far as to don male attire for the purpose of being able to go out more quietly and unobservedly.

Though once condemned by nearly all as living an immoral life, we find time has vindicated her, and she now stands as the head of all French writers of fiction.

Her soul was full of purity, high aspirations, noble feelings, grand principles, and admirable beliefs. Conscientious, loving, and truthful, honest, frank, and energetic, she accomplished almost miracles. Independent and self-reliant, she was ages beyond her time, and even now the world fails to appreciate her as it will some time do.

Her novels "Indiana" and "Consuelo" are her best-known works, and once read are never forgotten.

She died June, 1876, and over her grave the great

Victor Hugo thus eulogized her: "She is the one great woman in this country whose mission it was to finish the French Revolution and commence the Revolution of Humanity. Equality of the sexes being a branch of the equality of man, a great woman was necessary. It was for a woman to prove that her mind might possess all gifts without losing a particle of her angelic nature—might at once be strong and gentle. George Sand was that woman. She is one of the glories of our age and country. She had a great heart like Barbes, a great mind like Balzac, and a great soul like Lamartine. She was good, and accordingly she had detractors, but the insults to her were of that kind which posterity will count as glories."

Thus it is the world crucifies its saviors, imprisons its teachers, and maligns its helpers; and

> It is the one who does the best
> That gets more kicks than all the rest.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

On the Threshold of Prison.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: News from Boston that all motions are overruled and that United States District Attorney Allen will move for my sentence at 11 A.M. to-morrow. Judge Carpenter seems to think that no law or custom can hinder his will to make "punishment" swift and severe. June 25, 1878, twelve years ago, they had granted, in the same court, five months and seven days between conviction and sentence. Now the Comstock-Wanamaker order to "push Heywood" seems to hav free course to "stamp out" whom it will. Many thanks to you and other Freethinkers for the timely and kindly service rendered. Whatever to-morrow brings me, I trust Mrs. Heywood, the children, and the Word, as exponents of liberty in right here invaded, will hav the co-operativ support which the cause and the occasion bespeak.

In your issue of June 21st, you spoke of Wanamaker's order to Deacon Gregory, the postmaster here, relativ to furnishing "proof" of publications for inspection before mailing, as like the Russian system. Please note in June Word that order goes much further than czarism. A copy is required to be deposited for mailing before one can know whether it is mailable or not. That is, Wanamaker "orders" that one must render himself liable to ten years' imprisonment and $5,000 fine as a means of learning what is mailable and what not.

Please note also that Wanamaker's "order" to Deacon Gregory to hold publications to be used as basis of prosecution was utterly illegal:

> Such matter may be sent by express without violating any law of the United States.—Benedict, J., in U. S. vs. Bennett, 16 Blatch, 358.
> Nor can regulations be enforced against the transportation of printed matter in the mail, which is open to examination, so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is as essential to that freedom as liberty of publishing; indeed, without the circulation the publication would be of little value. If, therefore, printed matter be excluded from the mails, its transportation in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.—Field, J., in Ex-Parte Jackson, 6 Otto, 733.

After declining to mail matter the post-office department has no further property or moral jurisdiction over it. But what is law to the Vice Society hounds, thirsting for Freethought blood?

The state case still drifts; probably Henry Chase, the "agent" of the Boston Vice Society vipers, will hav to wait until the chief rattle-snake, Anthony Comstock, alias John Wanamaker, has fastened his fangs in me. But the people will, by and by, sense the truth we stand for, see and say that the right thing was done at the right time and by the right man and woman here. In bonds or free, ever yours for Mental Freedom, E. H. HEYWOOD.

Princeton, Mass., July 2, 1890.

After writing you July 2d, word came that sentence is delayed; how long or why I know not. Possibly light is dawning into one "dark place of the earth" (the United States court in Boston).

July 4, 1890. E. H. HEYWOOD.

Our Suffering Sisters.

Beaconsfield once said, "There are Jews and Jews." In the same sense it is fair to say there are laws and laws. Some laws are useful for the protection of the people, other laws are of no use but to excite contempt. A vast volume of this latter class of laws is being ground out of legislativ mills in our times, and we are suffering from overproduction of unmarketable law, much of it badly damaged, much of it a mass of festering corruption that threatens social pestilence.

This country is afflicted just now with a swarm of unprincipled busybodies who hav a mania for regulating other people's morals by law. The practical result of this meddlesomeness of the incompetent is that laws are enforced to just that extent which will enable the police and constabulary to use them as a means of extorting blackmail, and not one whit further. While the rogues who make laws and the sharpers who make a net profit from their violation after paying roundly for immunity, escape legal penalties. Those penalties bear with ponderous oppression upon honest citizens who innocently transgress or who are guilty of technical violations of some preposterous malum prohibitum, and the discrimination practiced in the application of law works the dethronement of all respect for law.

I think the fellows that make these laws had better obey them. I hav been of that way of thinking ever since the memorable exposure of the vaseline and salycilic acid pamphlet. But now there comes to hand another case which more than ever confirms my notion that some way must be found to compel obedience to law on the part of those who work the legal racket on their fellow-citizens.

The International Medicsl Missionary Society, with headquarters at 118 East Forty-fifth street, in the city of New York, professes "to heal the sick, and preach the gospel in New York and other cities, and to train young men and women to go abroad as medical missionaries."

About the time of the conviction of Moses Harman and his sentence to five years' imprisonment for mailing the Markland letter, there appeared a little sixteen-page pamphlet published by this International Medical Missionary Society entitled, "Our Suffering Sisters." This pamphlet is a reprint of an article written by Mrs. Geo. D. Dowkontt and originally published by said society in its periodical, the Medical Missionary Record, and the purpose of the reprint was that this article should be in a convenient form for general and promiscuous distribution. The society urges those into whose hands this pamphlet may fall to "giv ten copies to their lady friends" and promises that copies will be sent free on application to the author, whose address is given as at the above headquarters.

The copy which lies before me, as I write, announces that "a first edition (2,000) of this little book being exhausted, a second edition (of 5,000) is now issued," and that "fifty copies can be had for one dollar." It is within my knowledge that a number of copies of "Our Suffering Sisters" hav been "deposited or proposed to be deposited in the mails for mailing and delivery" by the author.

The first page of this book contains a list of officers and members, among whom is discernible a plentiful sprinkling of names of members, contributors, and sympathizers of the "Vice Society." Turning over to page 7, under the sub-title, "Barbarous Ignorance," we find a perfect counterpart of the Markland letter. It is a description of "the fearful tortures that tender women hav to endure through the ignorance and superstition that enshroud their lives," and presents in vivid colors the agonies which the women of Ragoon, Burmah, suffer in childbirth through the barbarous treatment of ignorant native midwives. The writer shows the horrible effects of ignorance, and deplores the lack of sex-knowledge, in the same way Mr. Markland does in his now famous letter. The spirit and purpose of both writers seem to be the same. To complete the parallelism, the writer, who describes the sufferings of women in India, makes use of the Latin term for the female sex organ in very much the same way that Mr. Markland uses the Latin term for the male sex organ in his story of the sufferings of women in America. The fact that the only perceptible difference between this little book and the Markland letter is that in the first sympathy is evoked for "our suffering sisters" many thousands of miles away, while in the last compassion is asked for "our suffering sisters" at home, has led some one to query whether the law is to be enforced against us by a penalty of five years' imprisonment when our charity begins at home, while the mails are free for those who express similar ideas in similar language, but confine their efforts to work among the heathen abroad.

No more humiliating and exasperating spectacle was ever presented to the American people than that of the barefaced, unrestrained, promiscuous circulation of "Our Suffering Sisters" by the same people through whose co-operation the infamous Vice Society has been enabled to imprison Moses Harman for five years under pretense that he did a great wrong in mailing the Markland Letter.

I don't say there is anything obscene about "Our Suffering Sisters." I simply say that the fellows who made the laws had better be made to obey them.

JAMBLICHUS.

Heywood, Harman, and Reid.

In many respects the situation of these three men is of a nature to call forth the sympathy of all friends of humanity and lovers of justice everywhere. In each case the rulings of the judge during trial and the charge to the jury is of such a character that to an unprejudiced observer it would seem that the high, manly, and dignified character usually supposed to control a judge, especially of our national courts, has degenerated to a level with a mere pettifogger practicing in the lowest police courts of our cities. In each case there seemed to exist a spirit of malicious vindictivness unworthy of a judge. For those reasons it is not strange that the sympathy natural to humanity in behalf of the oppressed should be aroused, and that the personal friends of those men should feel indignant, and that they should make a strong effort for a new trial or unconditional pardon.

But there is another side to this question, and it is one that all Freethinkers should consider carefully, and not allow their natural sympathy for the unfortunate to so warp their judgment that they inadvertently assume a position that may place each individual in the wrong, and in the end work an injury to Liberalism in general.

Those men, each and all, hav promulgated theories and engaged in practices contrary to law. They knew it, but each persisted in his course. The laws may be wrong, but breaking them does not right them. Those men may be, and probably are, honest in their convictions; they may really believe not only that what they advocate is true, but that the world will be bettered by belief and acceptance. But that does not justify them in knowingly, willfully, and perseveringly placing themselvs and their friends and followers in the position—to state it mildly—of those who seek to disregard laws made and placed on our statutes by proper authority. It is the privilege and duty of Liberals all and everywhere to point out the evils of existing laws—and they are many—and in every legitimate, proper manner endeavor to hav them amended or repealed and better ones substituted.

Freethinkers will not fill their ranks nor strengthen the cause they advocate by either directly or indirectly tendering their sympathy by words or acts to assist those who hav knowingly placed themselvs under the ban of the laws, and then, posing as martyrs, through their friends gone begging for means to help them out of the trouble they hav willfully placed themselvs in.

There is much need of all the money that Liberalism can command, to be used to promote the general principles of the American Secular Union, and place prominently before our people, by lectures and the diffusion of printed information generally, the impending danger to our liberties caused by the great efforts being made for a practical union of church and state by amendments to our national Constitution and otherwise.

It is not in accordance with the principles of true Liberalism to even indirectly seem to giv countenance and support to any of the cranky ideas of Anarchists, Socialists, freelovers, or of those who hav extreme and unacceptable ideas of sexual and depraved notions of social and family relations. There are more important and better things that require all the mental, physical, and financial aid that can be obtained to advance our cause.

Occasionally, during the past three years, I hav received sample copies of a paper published at Princeton, Mass., with the following at the head of the editorial column: "Pay no interest, rent, profit, taxes, or other unjust demands. Produce, exchange without restriction and without robbery. Marry not at all; but serve, recreate, finding in reason religion, and in love law."

The paper is a labor union and Anarchistic publication, and advocates what it considers Liberal Freethought principles.

All true Liberals who hav at heart the promotion and success of that Liberalism that will make better social relations and retain in purity the principles of the government formed by our fathers, should giv such sentiments a wide berth. CONVERSE CLOSE.

F. C. MENDE,
Treasurer American Secular Union (per I. C. C.).

Philadelphia, Pa., July 1, 1890.

AMONG the curious habits of Christian people is that of kissing a very dirty, greasy book, that has been handled by people in all stages of filth and in many stages of disease. When they want to assure their neighbors that they are speaking the truth, they take an oath in the name of their God and then put their lips to this unclean relic. Where a duke connected with royalty, however, was concerned, an innovation was made, and a nice, new, clean cover was put on the dirty Bible ere the ducal lips were pressed to its surface! Among the minor advantages of being an unbeliever is the right of affirmation, which protects the heretic from the unclean practice which the Christian is compelled to perform. —Annie Besant.

Progress of the Work in Washington.

The following extract from the editorial columns of the Lynden Pioneer Press is the best commentary on the actual results accomplished by the Washington Secular Union:

A request has been made that the Press publish an article upon the subject, "What religion shall be taught in our public schools?" It is not deemed advisable to open up such a field for controversy through a local paper. The Secular Union has succeeded in having the reading of scripture, prayer, and singing discontinued in the schools of Lynden, and the Press don't purpose to be drawn into the controversy at this stage either upon the one side or the other.

In many public schools in the state religious exercises and instruction are persisted in, in defiance of the law. That generous, loyal, and trusty champion of Liberalism, Peter Selde, of Davenport, Lincoln co., protested against the teacher enforcing recitation by his children of the Lord's prayer, or the use of any prayers in the public schools, but the teacher persists in defiance of remonstrance.

The average Christian teachers seem to be of the opinion that so far as indulgence in religious exercises is concerned, they will be sustained by the church in defying the law. Our worthy president, R. Winsor, has made a brief giving the law-points, and sent it, accompanied with a kind letter, to that teacher, urging obedience to the constitution, and thus avoidance of litigation, with its attendant irritation and fierce dissensions.

I was about to return funds contributed to the "defense fund" when we received reliable information that the state university in this city has regular chapel exercises, Bible reading, prayer, sermons, hymns, etc.

Our president and some member of our board of directors will visit the university during its sessions, so as to proceed on sure evidence, and then enter a protest, furnishing the faculty with brief, so they can not plead their violation of the law was from lack of knowledge of its requirements.

An act in relation to the establishment and government of the University of the state of Washington (pages 516 to 521, Session Laws, 1889–90), provides:

Sec. 15. The fund of the university shall be derived from the proceeds of sales of lands devoted by the United States for the endowment of the university, and the admission and tuition fees of the students, and such appropriations as the legislature may make.

Sec. 21. The sum of ten thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, etc.

State constitution, Art. i, Sec. 11. No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment.

Doubtless we shall hav a fierce contest, for the religionists will rally all their forces. But if a big fight, it will surely result in our obtaining a big victory, for reason, right, and all the law is on our side.

The one only great trouble is lack of funds; despite the most careful, rigid economy, we are miserably hindered for lack of means. I hav hesitated to publish the list of contributions, because of dislike to expose how meager hav been receipts, and hoped each day the amount would be swelled to creditable proportions. But publication cannot be deferred beyond next week.

The apathetic and careless will please take due notice and govern themselvs accordingly. Your contribution may necessarily be small; then the less reason for withholding it. If all will do the little they can without inconvenience or real self-sacrifice, they will spare anxiety, weary care, and cruel injustice to the workers, and funds absolutely needed to insure successful prosecution of the work will be on hand.

Church property throughout the state is not being assessed as the constitution demands. I hav prepared letters to the governor urging his issuing special instructions to all auditors and assessors of the state, insisting on their performance of their duties in compliance with the requirements of the constitution, but delayed forwarding it under advice of our astute president, R. Winsor, until we can accompany the letter with evidence that in many parts of the state the assessors are willfully or ignorantly omitting to assess church property, thus occasioning loss to the revenues of the state, and increasing the burden of taxation on other property. I hav written to our vice-presidents to interview the assessors of their respectiv districts and write me the reasons given for such non-compliance with the law. But I am embarrassed and hindered because in so many places Liberals hav failed to enroll as members of the Washington Secular Union, and no vice-president has been elected with whom correspondence can be maintained on this and many other important matters.

Let every Liberal in Washington who really desires the cessation of religious exercises and instruction in our public schools, the just taxation of all church property, and the abolition of compulsory Sunday laws—who has not already done so—giv evidence of their sincerity by immediate enrollment in the ranks of the Washington Secular Union, and election of a vice-president to be executiv officer of the state society for their precinct. Is this asking too much? Why should not all share the burden, when all will be benefited by the result? Please answer at once.

SUNDAY LAW ENFORCED IN WASHINGTON.

My constant, earnest appeals for all Liberals to enroll in the state organization for mutual protection, that so we may reap the harvest of the good seed sown, and enjoy the fruits of our bill of rights in the constitution, meets with cool indifference from many. "Law is all right; no need of organization. Can not hav any religious exercises in our public schools. We do not hav to take oaths; we affirm just as we please. All church property has to pay its full share of taxes. They never can enforce any Sunday law. Our constitution fixes all that," they say. Yes; some Liberals, at cost of time, means, and hard work, secured all that. The constitution does guarantee absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious belief and sentiment, and that no one shall be disturbed in person or property on account of religion.

But eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. And if Liberals do not watch, guard, and defend the rights and privileges the constitution affords us, the despotic tyranny of the church will be exercised despite our constitutional guarantee.

It is only by rigid, scrimping economy that I can liv. I cannot afford the luxury of a daily paper. I hav to depend on accidental opportunities to read other people's. Our president informed me that the Post-Intelligencer contained an article on religion in our schools that I ought to read. So I indulged in the extravagance of purchasing a copy, and looking over the papers found the following article:

TACOMA, June 18.—The clerks employed in the retail clothing trade recently formed an association with the principal object of securing the closing of all clothing stores on Sundays, and appointed T. Nash to hav the Sunday law enforced. On Monday warrants were sworn out against L. Moses, J. E. Herlich, David Jordan, and Abe Blask. They were heard before Justice Patrick this morning and fined $25 each and costs. The cases were all appealed to the superior court.

There are no members of the Washington Secular Union in Tacoma. I hav written to each of the parties arrested and hav arranged to go there and deliver lectures in the basement of the Unitarian church—the only place attainable—on the evenings of the 25th, 26th, and 27th. I presume none of the parties are Liberals; certainly they are not liberal, for they do not subscribe for any Liberal paper, are not members of or contributors to the Washington Secular Union. But the wrong done them, the outrage of arrest and fine, the ignoring of constitutional rights, is just the same, and if not checked it will surely reach Liberals erelong.

O that the facts might be realized, so that each Liberal would feel the duty to be prepared for defense of others, so that when the iron clutch of ecclesiastical despotism seized on one, all could rally to the rescue.

I shall do all possible with our very limited means to arouse the people of Tacoma to a sense of the great wrong done, and endeavor to post them on the law of the Sabbath and Sunday, both biblical and constitutional, in hopes the informed intelligent will check fanatics in such outrages on personal liberty and the constitutional rights of the citizen.

FURTHER CAMPAIGNING.

Desirous the religionists of Lynden should realize that the action of the Washington Secular Union in insisting on the cessation of all religious exercises or instruction in our public schools was prompted solely by desire to promote the greatest good to the greatest number; and that obedience to the just and wise provisions of the constitution conduces equally to the benefit and best interests of Christians as of Liberals, I went to Linden and there delivered lectures on "What Religion Should be Taught in Our Public Schools?" and "Why the Cross Above the Flag?"

Through the efforts of Frank O'Neil, president of the Lynden Secular Union, and one of the most deservedly popular comrades of the G. A. R. post, I received an invitation by unanimous vote of the post to deliver an address at their memorial services to be held at the Opera House, on Friday morning, Decoration day.

But the spirit of bigotry was rampant—the church choir would not sing—the parsons would go into fits, and were giving the post fits for extending me the invitation—some of the fanatics vowed they would leave the hall and break up the services if that awful wicked wretch of an Infidel was allowed on the platform. But the friends of reason and right were firm. The caldron of religious bigotry was boiling. Speaking was adjourned until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. During the interim the high respect for Frank O'Neil of all classes enabled him to allay the fury of pious frenzy. A committee was appointed and waited on me to ask assurance that I would not in my address make any attack on Christianity or introduce my religious opinions, etc. I assured the committee I never carried politics into a lodge-room, or favored even the most able and humorous of singers indulging in comic songs at a funeral. It never seemed to hav occurred to the religionists that there was real need to request the ministers and pious choir not to introduce their religious opinions.

Two ministers preceded me; each read the ordinary laudatory sermon, paying just, deserved tribute to the noble heroes of the war.

When I stepped upon the platform, two or three men and women noisily rushed out. I am assured that some of the feminin fanatics pinched the babies within reach, in hopes their cries would disconcert the ugly old Infidel; but that after I had spoken a few minutes they angrily hushed the little darlings' faintest whimperings, so eager were they that all should hear. The reason was, I claimed some remembrance, some little tribute of respect and gratitude, for the soldiers of that other, more heroic army who endured the horrors of war with no soul-stirring music of fife and drum, no glittering pride and pomp of military display, no grand ambition of fame and glory, no chance of promotion on the field or honorable mention in the dispatches, to inspire them, yet suffered privation, sickness, death, only to be then as now ignored, forgotten. No, no! never, never, never quite forgotten.

To-day we see the scarred and mutilated veterans, and rightly giv them our grateful sympathy and tributes of praise. But we cannot see the poor old mother's bruised and bleeding heart, nor listen to her sobs of despair in her lonely life—her only boy killed.

We cannot see the agony of woe on gentle-looking women's faces when news of the battle came—husband, father, brother, lover, in the fight.

We can recall the harrowing, pitiful sight of the mutilated forms, the ghastly wounds, the bleeding, quivering flesh, the dying groans of the hospital. But oh, the prolonged dumb agony of the despairing, bleeding hearts of the brave army of gentle, heroic women, martyrs to the cause of freedom. Oh, the piteous cries of orphaned children!

You cannot see the weary toil, the hard, bitter, lonesome struggle with poverty, that forbade even the luxury of tears, for tears might impair the sight, needed to earn bread. Soldiers' widows, "sewing at once a shirt and shroud" to keep life in the poor orphaned little ones!

Whilst glowing eulogies, tributes of respect, and garlands of beautiful flowers, so well deserved, are lavished in profusion on the grand army of heroic men, I only ask, let one tear fall, spare one little flower to adorn the grave and honor the memory of the heroic women who made it possible for the men to fight to preserve intact the glorious galaxy of stars that adorn our nation's flag.

At the lecture in the evening there was a large attendance—more women than men. Saturday night the down-pouring rain did not dampen the enthusiasm; I had large attendance and good interest; after the lecture a grand social dance, under the cheering influence and direction of that whole-souled champion of Liberalism and embodiment of kind-heartedness, R. A. Brown, and the congenial, handsome young giant, Worthen. All declared it was a truly enjoyable time, and regretted that midnight came so soon, and that in consideration for the feelings and prejudices of the pope's Sunday-keepers the festal occasion ended as the clock struck twelve.

There is a bright and glorious future for the Lynden Secular Union, composed as it is of the best, most intelligent, and influential citizens of the town.

What courage and perseverance can accomplish under the most adverse circumstances follows.

Roeder, Whatcom county, is not even a little village, only a school-house on a country road, the little settlement of Nooksack on the other side of the river rabid Presbyterian, a few Liberals scattered over five miles of bad roads. Not much use to try to organize a Liberal society, eh? But D. E. Rice, one of those quiet, modest, persistent forces that effect great results without much surface commotion, loving the truth for truth's sake, with a hereditary benevolence well cultivated by constant exercise, is a power for good. It was through his efforts I was enabled to giv the first Liberal lecture at Roeder school-house. Three times I hav been there and each time a savage storm. At my second visit, despite dark, fierce wind, and snow, I obtained eleven names to the Washington Secular Union, and they elected J. W. Bell vice-president, and organized the Roeder Secular Union with D. E. Rice for president. At my last visit it rained incessantly from Saturday night until 3 o'clock Monday afternoon. I will let the Lynden Pioneer Press tell the story, for none can accuse it of favoring the Liberals:

One of the most enjoyable entertainments of the season was given by the Roeder Secular Union on the evening of June 2d. Mr. C. B. Reynolds had been giving a brief series of lectures, which culminated in a dance and supper at the school-house. In spite of the rain and mud the school-house was literally packed by an eager and intelligent audience to listen to the intellectual treat given by Mr. Reynolds on the subject of "Education." After the lecture the benches were set aside and the stove removed, and until 3 o'clock in the morning the votaries at the shrine of Terpsichore tripped the light fantastic. Refreshments were furnished by Mrs. D. E. Rice, and her well-known skill in the culinary art renders praise unnecessary. Receipts of the evening, $47.40.

The Nooksack Reporter gave an equally complimentary notice of the lectures and festival.

After the organization of the Roeder Secular Union, three different times Mr. Rice appointed a meeting to complete organization and commence work, and each time the elements combined to render any meeting impossible; undauntedly a fourth appointment was made, and a large attendance rewarded his persistency. The society now meets regularly every other Sunday, has lectures by home talent, discussions, literary, music, and science school. And this has all been effected by one man's self-sacrificing, persistent endeavors.

Now the onward march is easy, for Mr. Rice has the help of that jolly old veteran, Charley Shea, and his popular son Charley Shea, Jr.; Mac, the ferryman, rough as an old oak, with heart as true, generous as the sunshine; the erudite D. Bell, an able musician, and the well-posted but inert S. Force. They are all rejoicing in the acquisition of Mrs. E. M. Wilcox, a lady of culture, very thoroughly posted, with a most lovable, winning way of charming away prejudice and arousing to thought and investigation all with whom she converses, an admirable worker in the cause.

A new city, Nooksack City, some five miles off, has sprung into existence, and as result of the efforts at Roeder I hav urgent invitation to go there to lecture and good hope of working up interest and forming another local Liberal society.

The work is onward; let us all be encouraged—do all the little we can, and victory is sure to follow.

What Freethought Has Done for Mankind.

The English statesman, Mr. Gladstone, who is not in the habit of making admissions, has in his recent series of articles on "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture" acknowledged that the "destructiv criticisms of heretical writers are for the most part valid."

This is a significant admission. It is an acknowledgment from an accomplished opponent that the labors of the great Freethinkers of the past hav not been in vain.

And what has destructiv criticism done?

It has impeached the authorship and authenticity of the Pentateuch, demonstrated the unscientific character of the early chapters of Genesis, overturned the story of the fall, laughed the fable of the flood out of the minds of men, and put the stories of the tower of Babel, Balaam's talkativ quadruped, Samson's invincible jawbone, and Jonah's whale on the same level as the Arabian Nights and Baron Munchausen's tales.

It has done this for the Old Testament. What else? It has done much more. Having removed the chief prop of the Christian creed, the fall of the first Adam, it has by the same stroke broken the second prop, the doctrin of atonement by the second Adam—Jesus. All this it has done in a multitude of ways; so that if one method fails to remove deeply rooted superstitions, another as certainly succeeds. Indeed, destructiv criticism not only goes the length of destroying the basis of the Christian creed—its logical end is to destroy supernaturalism altogether. Let us for a few moments consider the services of our great dead to the cause of intellectual freedom.

Nearly five hundred years before the alleged birth of Christ, Socrates denied the Athenian gods. True, he believed in a fanciful deity of his own manufacture, but he was regarded as an Atheist in his own day.

The fair Hypatia, too, who was barbarously murdered by a Christian zealot, rendered signal service to the cause of Freethought.

And what shall we say of Bruno—the martyr and hero, who in the sixteenth century used the destructiv method successfully not only against the Bible, but against the false science that was then accepted by the schools in all the nations of Europe.

What genius! What honesty! What courage!

We appreciate his genius; and shed tears of sympathy as we read of his heroic death.

We turn next to Spinoza.

He was born at Amsterdam on Nov. 24, 1632, and died Feb. 21, 1677. Another great destructiv critic.

Himself a Jew, he brought his great knowledge of Hebrew to bear upon the examination of the Bible, and discredited its value by purely scientific methods. For this he was anathematized by the Jewish church, and made an outcast; by simplicity of living, by patience, industry, and perseverance, he became one of the greatest of the world's philosophers.

From Spinoza we come to Voltaire, the poet, playwright, and philosopher.

Voltaire was a wit. He threw the dart of sarcasm into the very core of Christianity. He ridiculed the false, and laughed the foolish out of men's minds. No wonder the priests hated him. No wonder they were ready to imprison him. But they could not destroy his work; though he could and did destroy their creed.

From Voltaire to Thomas Paine is the next step.

What a splendid destructiv critic he was!

Neither Bishop Watson nor the whole bench of bishops from his day down to the present time could answer the "Age of Reason." This work not only exposed the errors of the Pentateuch; it made war also against the morality of the Bible, and left the Christian nothing but a bundle of contradictions and absurdities to constitute his creed.

A number of great critics hav arisen since the days of Paine—men like Colenso, Kalisch, Strauss, Renan, and others—but had it not been for the courage of these earlier heretics, the later men would probably hav gone to the grave without contributing much toward our intellectual emancipation.

What, then, has Freethought done for the world?

It has given us science.

Science is knowledge, and this knowledge, the germs of which were sown by the illustrious Freethinkers of the past, has converted the world from a howling wilderness of barbarians into a home of comparativ comfort for mankind.

What has Freethought done for the world?

It has abolished slavery; destroyed the idea of witchcraft; improved morality—made, indeed, the value of an action consist not in obeying the will of an imaginary deity, but in promoting human well-being.

And so we sing the praises of Freethought and extol the virtues of its heroes and martyrs; and this we shall continue to do until the people come to recognize the source of their advancement and to acknowledge their indebtedness to the world's great heroes.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Pitiful Lying.

Seclusion or quietude is no relief from usefulness, even in the advisory department. And in this I hav been rather unfortunate. Recently I received a letter from my friend A. C., who was located by my advice in a town in Connecticut, reputed as a healthy spot, I apprising him at the same time its inhabitants had fixed beliefs in Calvinism or predestination, which protected them from any religious controversy, which, by the by, although an enlightened Liberal, he greatly detests. But here is what he writes me:

My old stand-by friend D. B., I find this small town much as you described. The boating, fishing, crabbing, and oystering are all one could desire, and my quiet snoozes in meeting on Sabbath days (I had almost written Sundays) pass without observation or comment.

There is a soothing mildness in the parson's long prayers and rural sermons that I begin to like, and the nasal rendering of "Old Hundred" is particularly pleasing to the ears of an invalid. This is noted for being an unusually quiet town, but last Sabbath it had a remarkable episode in the way of a change. The afternoon services were somewhat curtailed to allow to Rev. Dr. Ralps to make a few remarks particularly addressed to young people. He commenced by dwelling on the importance of professing a religious life, the earlier the better. He said his pious father took early opportunities to impress upon us children as we beheld some ragged, hatless, unshaven, passing vagrant, the awful neglect of religious training, and yet he would shudderingly remark that disgusting as this poor wretch was he was quite superior in appearance to Tom Paine, the great Infidel, the author of the "Age of Reason;" this homeless, houseless Infidel exceeded him far in filthiness, rags, vermin, and bloat.

He continued by saying his father was acquainted with a friend who was at Tom Paine's deathbed, and said his screams for divine mercy were heard a square off and were terrific!

Here a heavy chest groan resounded from various quarters of the meeting-house, accompanied with much sighing from the women. The reverend doctor looked painfully down upon his sympathetic crowd; but he resumed:

"My Christian friends, I hav been asked perhaps a hundred times if I had read his damnable book. I hav but one answer to this daring question, and that is a pious negativ. No! and I caution all young people within hearing to follow my example and to remain in pious ignorance! God knows his men, and he is blind indeed who cannot perceive his divine agents—agents in building up his earthly kingdom.

"In vain the impious Franklin drew lightning from heaven. In vain did Washington blaspheme in the heart of battle; or Tom Jefferson utter that unscriptural assertion that all men are created free and equal, thus freeing by thousands the wooly niggers."

I assure you, my friend D. B., my condition was trying for an invalid; but repressing feelings, I was astounded by the exclamation, "Ralps, you are a damned liar, and a cowardly defamer of great and good men; yes, a prince of liars." But here the speaker, whoever he was, was cut short, being seized by three stalwart deacons and dragged to the door, and, I presume, summarily punished for interrupting the meeting. My weak condition precludes me from saying much, but I make good use of Paine's "Age of Reason" that I purchased at THE TRUTH SEEKER office by lending it around.

Behold, How the Brethren Love One Another!

From the Catholic Review.

If it were the custom of persons residing in other planets, if other be inhabited, to visit earth during the summer season they would observe the regular recurrence of certain phenomena, physical and metaphysical, political and social. They would find earth people, whose habitation ten months in the year is rural, seeking urban change. They would find urban residents fleeing to the country. A considerable movement of population might be detected corresponding indeed to the migration of birds from latitude to latitude, not so massiv as to darken the air, but thick enough to indicate a community and definitness of purpose. They would find schools generally closed. Churches, they would observe, share the phenomena affecting houses devoted to pedagogy; but when the character of the temples is investigated, the result would arouse conjecture and inquiry.

The founder of Christianity had not bidden his apostles preach the gospel except in the heated term; and the saving of souls might reasonably be assumed a daily and a nightly business, since day and night, through winter solstice and summer languor, death snaps the cord and sends men before the judgment seat. The visitors would find that the churches closed and the ministers absent are all Protestant. The Catholic churches are open as usual.

But what of the ministers? Are they all fishing, canoeing, hunting? Are they praying on mountain tops and reading the Bible in the seclusion of forests? Are they keeping a leafy spiritual fast which will bring them back purer of heart, clearer of mind, stronger for the work they believe is the Lord's? Verily, no. They hav closed their churches, but they hav carried the bigotry thereof with them and they are engaged in those annual conventions which are the chief illustration of the vitality of Protestantism. Without these conventions it would be doubtful whether the Protestant sects would remain organized. The attendance at their weekly services is generally slim except when something sensational is the allurement. They are able to buy better music talent than Catholic churches, the best music in which is furnished by the congregation when they are so fortunate as to sing, and by boys trained to assist in the sanctuary. The Protestants hav cosy audience chambers. They hav fashion, style, wealth. Yet during the months when their pupils are occupied at home, and during the vacations when so many of the conventions and assemblies are held, only one phenomenon is discerned which is palpable proof that Protestantism is really alive. This phenomenon is the periodicity and vigor with which the ministers slander the Catholic church.

Periodically the phenomenon breaks forth. Men who hav been somnolent all winter and hav generally sent their congregations to sleep, break out into violent vituperation the moment the annual conference or meeting or synod begins the summer campaign against the pope. Obscurities whom want of learning, lack of opportunity, and deficiency of everything intellectual and social hav combined to preserve in shadow, seize upon the occasion to distinguish themselvs by the fervor of their falsehoods about Catholic belief concerning church and state.

Rancorous demagogs, incapable of even muddling scripture, so little do they know of it, find at these times splendid chances to get their scurrilous screeds into the newspapers and afterward flatter themselvs that they may expect a call within a twelvemonth at another $1,000 a year. The same old lies are told over. Year after year the same men will stand up in the same resorts and utter the same calumnies which were uttered there before then and will be repeated after they are gone.

No considerable body of Protestants can agree upon anything affirmativ within their own organizations. They are at outs among themselvs over the liquor question. They differ about the fusion of whites and blacks in churches and schools and about divorce. They quarrel over forms of church societies and forms of church service. They disagree about the Bible in the public schools and they cannot agree upon compulsory education. As for doctrinal unity, as well expect the stars to change their circuits as Protestants to unite in dogma. All with them is negativ, fragmentary, dissolving, except their determination to assault the Catholic church and to libel Catholics. That and that alone is substantiv and Protestantism.

Nothing livs by negation and livs healthfully. Therefore because Protestantism is substantial only in this, its membership is shifting and transitory. Its more independent men are as a rule Infidels or indifferent. Its women attend church largely for the social status and opportunities expected. Its creeds are either never stated or are disputed when stated. Its pulpits are dedicated to politics, sociology, literature, pseudo philosophy, and fads. No wonder so many of the Protestant churches are closed a part of the year. The wonder is that they can be kept open the rest of it.

Now comes science, and asserts that nothing has been made all at once, and that all the facts of creation are or will be accounted for by the theory of the evolution of matter. Everything now and in the past has grown or developed by slow stages from simpler forms, in accordance with laws which are just beginning to be clearly understood. There is no such thing as the "act of God," as that term has usually been understood; but every event, from the lightning's stroke to the musketo's sting, is traceable to the workings of law. God never interferes by miracles or special providences.—Robert C. Adams.

Theological Virtues and Human Vices.

That Christianity, whether true or false, is worthy of preservation as a support to public morality, is a favorit argument with many who are compelled to admit that it rests, to say the least, upon insufficient evidence. Blind leaders of the blind, they fail to see the incontrovertible logic of facts, which points it out as the greatest foe to human virtue existing among us. That those who hav most religion are not the best members of society is our daily experience. Human nature, not perverted by religious belief, always knows good from evil, though it often chooses to follow a wrong path. It is in the pious soul that we find the judgment corrupted as well as the will. The deluded being filled with fear of an imaginary God becomes so utterly confused that he does not even know his duty to his fellow-man.

The theological virtues, so called because they are the fruits of a supposed knowledge of God, are three: Faith, hope, and charity. Theological virtues they may be, but human vices, sins against ourselvs and against each other, they certainly are.

Faith, according to the definition of St. Paul (if he wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews), is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen" (Heb. xi, 1). This is nonsense, a jumble of words without sense. We hope to receive things in the future, and if we already possess the substance of those things, we hav nothing left to hope for. Faith is not the evidence of things not seen, but belief in things for which there exists no evidence. It is the first of the theological virtues, from which both the others derive their being, but as a human vice it is called credulity, and is the source of countless errors and superstitions. The author of the above quoted epistle continues: "Through faith we understand that the worlds were formed, through the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear" (v. 3). Just so. By faith, if we, unfortunately for us, hav inherited that mental disease, and hav not yet eradicated it from our brains, we understand that scientific truth is false and theological falsehood true. "By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac" (v. 17). He was ready to murder his own son, because he feared to displease a tyrannical and wicked God. Since his time many of the faithful hav steeped their hands in blood, in their anxiety to save their own miserable souls, which were not worth preserving at any cost. Hav faith, my brethren; believe every pious lie you hear, and look for your reward in another world, for verily I say unto you, you will hav a bad enough time of it in this.

The worst sinner on earth is the liar, and it is the credulous man that breeds him, as sure as rotten flesh breeds foul worms. The priests and preachers who devour the substance which should support better and honester men would find their occupation gone without the faithful believers who swallow absurd fables and pay for them in good dollars. The forger, the swindler, the confidence man would hav no victims, but for the spirit which is cultivated by faith of belief in "the evidence of things not seen." The fires of Smithfield would never hav been kindled, the daggers of St. Bartholomew would hav been unstained by blood, the dungeons of the Inquisition would not hav incarcerated suffering men and women, had not the cruel malice of the faithful found "the substance of things hoped for" in inflicting torture on the unbeliever. Sunday and Prohibition laws, legal enactments against blasphemy, the violation of the privacy of the mails in our own time and country, are the corrupt fruits of this miserable and liberty-destroying vice.

Hope is the second on the list of theological virtues. We look for its effects on mankind and see despair pictured on the faces of the lost and desolate wretches whom it has fooled. Its human name is improvidence. Hope for a harp, hope for a crown, hope for a white robe in heaven, and let the good things of earth go to the devil, for they belong to him. That is a theological virtue and a human crime. "Take, therefore, no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself" (Matt. vi, 34). Thousands hav followed this precept, and the morrow has taken thought for them in the almshouse, the jail, or the pauper's grave.

Charity is a word which has a pleasant sound. When we hear it we think of kind words, gentle thoughts, and loving, helping hands. But these belong to its human side and hold at best only a secondary place in the theological virtue. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment" (Matt. xxii, 37, 38). All for God, nothing for humanity. We must love the God described in the Old Testament, the instigator of the murder of whole tribes of human beings, the slaughterer of women, of children, and of helpless, innocent cattle. Human nature hates him, for he is hateful beyond the power of words to express. We must love the God of the New Testament, who consigned his only son to a cruel death upon the cross, because his combined omniscience and omnipotence could discern no other way to save a world which in his own caprice he had created. Human nature must find a worthier object to love, or love must wither, perish, and decay in the heart of man. We must love the God of nature who visits pestilence, famin, fire, and plague alike upon the just and on the unjust, who uses no discrimination, shows no mercy, feels no pity, knows no justice, but scatters blessings and curses, prosperity and adversity, regardless of where they may fall. Away with the love of God, source of hatred and neglect of man. Tear from it the sweet name of charity, which it has stolen from humanity, and in which it seeks to cloak its unnatural deformity. In this theological virtue behold the human vice, fruitful mother of barbarous crime, Fanaticism.

There is work to do in the garden of this world. Foul weeds that hav been sown by the arch enemy of mankind (not the devil but the preacher) hav to be rooted up and cast away and burnt to ashes. These theological virtues must be banished to eternal sheol that the natural virtues of humanity may hav a chance to grow. Then in the place of faith, hope, and charity, knowledge, prudence, and paternal love may flourish and bear fruit.

Sunday Laws.

The Attorney-General of Louisiana, if we may believe the Pearl of Days, the organ of the American Sabbath Union, has done a sensible thing. In his report to the legislature he recommends that the Sunday law of that state be stricken from the statute book or else modified so as to correspond with public sentiment upon this subject as it exists in New Orleans.

To strike the law from the statute books would of course be the wiser method, but if it can't be forced to go, then it should be amended. The most absurd things in the world are the Sunday laws for great cities. In New York, for instance, we hav a very stringent Sunday law, but it affects chiefly those institutions and businesses which it ought not to affect, and is violated in all the businesses which could best be spared on that day. Sunday in New York is a queer day. In the first place, all the museums and libraries—except Cooper library—are closed, and all the gin-mills and disreputable resorts are open, where, behind screens and drawn shades, men use more liquor and do worse acts than on any other day. If the museums were open many would be drawn away from these injurious places. Secondly, no one cares a rap for the Sunday law except the preachers. The people use the day for excursions, yachting, picnics, and outings of all sorts, without any reference to the law. It is a reasonable estimate, that a million people in New York break the Sunday law every week. To retain it, therefore, seems ridiculous.

Behind all statutes there must be public sentiment, for laws are only printed expressions of that sentiment, and without it no law can be generally enforced. It is for the bigot's and blackmailer's use only; and that of itself is sufficient reason why it should be repealed immediately upon losing the support of the general public. In two or three Southern states, the practical use of the law is only to punish Seventh-Day Adventists. In most Northern country communities its use is for the benefit of liquor-dealers who do a "bottle trade." In large cities the dishonest officials profit by it. But in no place does it promote morality and honesty. A man prevented from taking harmless recreation openly will usually resort to harmful pleasures slyly. The "Continental Sunday" of Europe is a thousand times better as a moral agent than the Puritan Sabbath of New England.

"Fighting Ingersollism."

Mr. Anthony Comstock and his smut-bag do not always succeed in gathering in the shekels of the faithful. Our Spiritualist friend, J. R. Perry, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., who makes organs and confutes the Materialists, reports that recently the smut-bag was circulating in his town for the purpose of holding a meeting to glorify the vaseline-and-salicylic-acid president of the Vice Society and incidentally to recoup its funds. Comstock visited the preachers and the leading pietists but the cash to hire a hall was not forthcoming. Some one, who must hav been a practical joker, advised the smut-bag to visit Mr. Perry's organ shop. Mr. Perry was not there but his boys were. "I want," said Comstock, "to collect funds to hire a hall and lecture on the evils of Ingersollism. Ingersollism is ruining the morals of the young people of the country. Vice is rampant," etc., etc. "But I hav always heard," replied one of the sons of his father, "that Mr. Ingersoll is one of the very best men in the country, and I believe in his teachings myself."

Comstock was astonished. "I hav come to the wrong place," he gasped, and grabbed his bag and disappeared. He left town the next day, unable to find people foolish enough to believe in his obscene tales of woe and to pay money to see the contents of his satchel and hear him repeat his stale lies about the good work he is doing "with the help of God."

There never was a viler slander upon a man or a cause than this claim of the Vice Society that its work is "fighting Ingersollism," by which Smut-bag Comstock means Freethought. With infinitly better grace could a society to suppress vice say it was fighting the Bible and Christianity, for the Bible contains a good deal of what the United States term obscenity, and the Christians are circulating that book by millions of copies. Comstock could, if he were not a canting hypocrit, make good points in that manner.

"Ingersollism," we suppose, is what Col. Robert G. Ingersoll thinks and says. Touching this question of vice the colonel has published a paragraph or two in reply to the same charge made by another canting and clownish hypocrit, the Rev. Mr. Talmage, Doctor of Divinity. The colonel said:

"Mr. Talmage, in order to make a point against Infidelity, states from his pulpit that I am in favor of poisoning the minds of children by the circulation of immoral books. The statement is entirely false. He ought to hav known that I withdrew from the Liberal League upon the very question whether the law should be repealed or modified. I favored a modification of the law, so that books and papers could not be thrown from the mails simply because they were 'Infidel.'

"I was and am in favor of the destruction of every immoral book in the world. I was and am in favor, not only of the law against the circulation of such filth, but want it executed to the letter in every state of this Union. Long before he made that statement, I had introduced a resolution to that effect, and supported the resolution in a speech. Notwithstanding these facts, hundreds of clergymen hav made haste to tell the exact opposit of the truth. This they hav done in the name of Christianity, under the pretense of pleasing their God. In my judgment, it is far better to tell your honest opinions, even upon the subject of theology, than to knowingly tell a falsehood about a fellowman. Mr. Talmage may hav been ignorant of the truth. He may hav been misled by other ministers, and for his benefit I make this explanation. I wanted the laws modified so that bigotry could not interfere with the literature of intelligence; but I did not want, in any way, to shield the writers or publishers of immoral books. Upon this subject I used, at the last meeting of the Liberal League I attended, the following language:

"'But there is a distinction wide as the Mississippi, yes, wider than the Atlantic, wider than all oceans, between the literature of immorality and the literature of Freethought. One is a crawling, slimy lizard, and the other an angel with wings of light. Let us draw this distinction. Let us understand ourselvs. Do not make the wholesale statement that all these laws ought to be repealed. They ought not to be repealed. Some of them are good, and the law against sending instruments of vice through the mails is good. The law against sending obscene pictures and books is good. The law against sending bogus diplomas through the mails, to allow a lot of ignorant hyenas to prey upon the sick people of the world, is a good law. The law against rascals who are getting up bogus lotteries, and sending their circulars in the mails is a good law. You know, as well as I, that there are certain books not fit to go through the mails. You know that. You know there are certain pictures not fit to be transmitted, not fit to be delivered to any human being. When these books and pictures come into the control of the United States, I say, burn them up! And when any man has been indicted who has been trying to make money by pandering to the lowest passions in the human breast, then I say, prosecute him! let the law take its course.'

"I can hardly convince myself that when Mr. Talmage made the charge he was acquainted with the facts. It seems incredible that any man, pretending to be governed by the law of common honesty, could make a charge like this knowing it to be untrue. Under no circumstances would I charge Mr. Talmage with being an infamous man, unless the evidence was complete and overwhelming. Even then, I should hesitate long before making the charge. The side I take on theological questions does not render a resort to slander or calumny a necessity. If Mr. Talmage is an honorable man, he will take back the statement he has made. Even if there is a God, I hardly think that he will reward one of his children for maligning another; and to one who has told falsehoods about 'Infidels,' that having been his only virtue, I doubt whether he will say: 'Well done good and faithful servant.'"

Let Smug-bag Comstock cease his prating about "fighting Ingersollism," or throw aside even his hypocritical pretense of being honest.

Against the Christian Religion.

The following item of Christian news has escaped our notice till now:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., June 14.—Commissioner Douglass says, speaking of the intention of the commissioners to stop the baseball game to-morrow: 'I thought it would shock the country to learn that such a thing as Sunday baseball was permitted at the national capital. If we had been unsuccessful in finding a law, I should hav done my utmost to manufacture one.'

"'You found a law, then?'

"'Yes, we did. The old common law of England held that the Christian religion was a part of the common law, and when the first settlers came to this country they brought the common law with them. You know that it is against the Christian religion to play ball on Sunday, for on its face it is a violation of the fourth Commandment. That is the law we operated upon in this case.'

"The Washington Base Ball Club determined to-night not to contend with the district commissioners, but to go over into Virginia and play on a neighboring race-track."

If there is any dishonest and tyrannical proceeding to which Christians will not resort to compel people to do as the Christians want them to do, some church paper ought to bring it forward.

What playing ball has to do with the Christian religion, or what the Christian religion has to do with "common" law, is something no fellow knows. Sunday breaking is purely a statutory crime; the best Christians in the world hav amused themselvs with games on Sundays, and never dreamed that they were doing anything against the Christian religion. The Puritan Sunday is a comparativly recent development of Christian tyranny. And if Christianity is a part of the common law there are a great many people who hav yet to learn the fact. A good many little judges hav said so, but it is not yet a settled principle of law; the United States Supreme Court in the Girard case decided the other way, and in the King Sunday breaking case, of Tennessee, the lawyers will again appeal to that court to know if a Seventh Day Adventist who keeps the Sabbath and violates Sunday can be fined without redress. Mr. King's lawyers differ from Commissioner Douglass about Christianity being a part of common law, and propose to hav the Supreme Court decide these points:

1. That the observance or non-observance of any particular day, as sacred, is solely a matter for the individual conscience of each citizen, and that the conscience of any one citizen has no right to bind or regulate the conscience of any other citizen in this or any other matter.

2. That it is a physical impossibility to set aside any particular period of time as sacred to be observed by all alike, for by reason of the revolution of the planets the divisions of time are radically different in different latitudes; that is to say, that while in Tennessee it may be the day we call Sunday, the same period of time may be Saturday or Monday in other parts of the country.

3. That, inasmuch as the defendant is a member of the Church of the Seventh Day Adventists, and therefore adheres, as a matter of religious faith, to the day called Saturday as sacred, the action of the court in this case is an interference with his religious liberty, an assumption on the part of the state to supervise and control his religious practices, and therefore unconstitutional.

When we get the decision in this case we shall know considerable more about common law de facto than we do now.

A New Puritan Country.

The Mosquito Reserve in Nicaragua is the latest place to use the Bible as a model for its laws. Its "Sunday Protection Act," passed last September, runs in these words:

"Be it enacted in council assembled and it is hereby enacted, that the day called Sunday is the appointed Sabbath of the Lord our God in this land of the Mosquito Reserve, and in it there shall not be done any manner of work, liable and under penalty of $10 and not to exceed $25 as heretofore."

The Mosquito Reserve Christians also believe that witchcraft may be practiced still, and to discourage it hav enacted:

"That all person or persons who practice and stand charged with practicing necromancy, obea, or obeaism, or employing charm or enchantment or killing, or otherwise hurting or attempting to hurt by poison, or by administering such noxious or hurtful draughts, as may tend to stupefy, or intended to stupefy any person or persons, by such wicked art or act, or acts or deed, shall be guilty of felony or misdemeanor or both, and shall suffer fine, imprisonment, corporal punishment and transportation, or fine, imprisonment and transportation.

"Should any person or persons attempt by necromancy, or by obea to discover hidden treasure, or to restore stolen goods or to provoke unlawful love, or to hurt any man or beast shall suffer fine, imprisonment, and transportation."

The Reserve is controled by a hereditary chief, and one of the government's prime ministers is the Rev. J. C. Thomas, a preacher and politician and merchant. From its laws we should judge the Reserve to be a second edition of Connecticut under the Puritans.

The Turpitude of Legislators.

It is not often that our national legislators talk hard constitutional sense, and Senator Vance of North Carolina is entitled to hav his speech on the admission of Idaho into the Union treasured up by the defenders of our Constitution, even if his illustrations do hit the Christians pretty hard.

It was July 1st that the bill to make Idaho a state was considered in the Senate, and finally passed. Mr. Vance opposed it on the following grounds:

"The preliminary proceedings had been unauthorized by any legislation; the population of the territory was not sufficient to entitle it to one representativ in the House; the constitution under which it proposed to come into the Union was not in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, in that it proscribed and disfranchised men for their religious opinions, and that the apportionment of its legislativ districts was so notoriously unfair and one-sided that it ought not to receive the sanction of fair and honest men in the Senate. A man, by the mere fact of his belonging to the Mormon church, Mr. Vance said, even though he had only one wife, or no wife at all, and though he conducted himself as a good citizen, was, under the constitution of Idaho, disfranchised and rendered forever incapable of voting, holding office, or sitting on a jury. That was what he protested against. Those pious men in the mountains of Idaho undertook to proscribe men for their religious belief. If alive today Moses, the great lawgiver of Israel, could not be mayor of a cross-roads town in Idaho. The patriarch could not sit in a town council and assist in proclaiming an ordinance for winding up the town clock or impounding hogs. King Solomon, in all his glory, could not issue a warrant for fifty cents, and King David, 'the man after God's own heart,' could not serve the warrant, and the rabbi could not sit upon the jury that tried the case. The prophets of God could not be overseers of the road along which they traveled with sandaled feet to deliver the divine message of wrath to sinful citizens."

When any state, or proposed state, disfranchises a man because of his religious opinions, however foolish, absurd, and superstitious those views may be, that state or proposed state needs reconstruction. To allow Roman Catholics to become citizens and bar out any other Christian sect is an inconsistency greater than any crime the Mormons ever committed.

Editorial Notes.

WE hope all of those interested in securing the liberation of Moses Harman from prison will send here for copies of the petition to the president, get them filled, and return them to us as soon as possible.

ON Tuesday, the 24th ult., Judge Bain, at Winnepeg, Manitoba, gave judgment in the famous separate school case. The judge upheld the law recently passed by the legislature abolishing separate schools, and granted an injunction to restrain teachers in Catholic schools from holding religious exercises.

ARCHBISHOP MIKE CORRIGAN has again triumphed over the friends of Dr. McGlynn. Dr. Burtsell, who defended the recalcitrant priest, was months ago ordered to remove from his city parish to Rondout, but refused to go, and appealed to Rome. Rome has now decided against him, and the machine, as McGlynn calls the hierarchy, is thereby strengthened. For unadulterated and cussed despotism the Roman Catholic church stands pre-eminent.

THE Catholic Review says of the clerical committee of the "Citizens' Movement," which we mentioned last week: "The Citizens' movement, which began to move forward last week, signalized its first start—and it will make many more of them—by nominating a batch of clergymen to its managing committee, among whom were Archbishop Corrigan and Rev. Father Ducey, with a hint that Dr. McGlynn might yet be introduced. A more ill-assorted company of ecclesiastics we hav yet to see. Their selection illustrates just how much the citizens of this particular movement know about public men and public affairs. We can assure them that they hav dropped into a mudhole in their Catholic appointments."

THE bishops of Brazil recently addressed a long pastoral to the faithful under their charge. It has reference to the change of government in that country, so far as it has affected the church. Two actions of the provisional government are separately objected to—the disestablishment of the church and the placing of various sects and sectaries on a footing with Catholicity. The bishop says: "The situation of our Brazil is not very brilliant just now. By a singular acoustical phenomenon, it faithfully repeats, on this side of the Atlantic, all the echoes of European revolutions. The spirit of hostility toward the church ferments among among us, during our exigencies, incarnated in a powerful and domineering sect. No, unfortunately, we can expect neither protection nor favors in the state as it is." Commenting upon their pastoral and Brazilian affairs, the Freeman's Journal, a Catholic organ in this city, prints this call to arms: "It may require a struggle to overcome the force and fraud that the irresponsible military junta, now ruling Brazil, will employ at the autumn elections. But the Brazilian people, as has been abundantly intimated, will not allow Senhor Fonseca and Company to continue in power. It is to be hoped that a counter-revolution will not be necessary. But the cabal should be overthrown at all costs."

MR. ANGUS GRIFFIN desires to know how many Liberals there are in the United States, as he is often asked the question. To which we can only reply, we do not know, and no one else does. The census does not ask the question of religion, and figures on that subject are gathered from church yearbooks. As nearly as we can tell, there are but a few thousands of activ Liberals—men and women who oppose the church's theology and politics—perhaps fifty thousand. Then there are the Spiritualists, a few more thousands who are also Liberals, and several hundred thousands of "Christian Spiritualists." Besides these are a great mass of people, mostly men, who are Agnostics, unbelievers in all of the creeds, but unaffiliated with other heretics. These must count up to millions in the various large cities. They are chiefly business men who read Radical publications on the quiet, and semi-Radical publications which the "literary" folks and the newspapers hav made "respectable" openly. Then there is a great body of millions more of indifferentists who do not go to church, but who do not read nor think upon the subject. The real church folks number about twenty millions, but a church-member of to-day, except in unprogressiv places, is no more like the Christian of half a century ago than our electric light is like the pine torches of our ancestors. The evolution and the influences of civilization are doing their perfect work even upon the Presbyterians; and in time will get down to the Methodists.

GARNETT, KAN., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Send along the paper, pictures and all. I'm no prude. Yours truly, CHARLES GREGG.

WANGMAN CREEK, June 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Put my vote down for pictures. I hav tried to get some subscribers for your paper, but in vain so far. I giv the papers away as soon as I hav read them. Some people like them and some do not. FRANK FORSLAND.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN , June 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send the old, reliable TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I like the paper very much, pictures and all. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Heston too

Yours fraternally, W. H. NOAH.

MARTINSVILLE, ILL., June 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the two new subscribers designated, and send me the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I hav been some time working up this little order; will try to do something more as soon as possible. I vote for a continuance of the pictures in the paper. They are great eye-openers. J. T. HOUSER.

AMITY, ORE., June 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav many enemies here to battle with, in the way of Christianity, but friendly otherwise. There is any amount of disbelievers who, for fear of offending mother, wife, child, or some friend, hold their peace. I hope some wide-awake speaker will come to this place and open the eyes of some of the gospel-stuffed youths of this place. I send $2 for the picture book. J. C. ROBISON.

UNION, MO., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen a copy of your paper recently and was very favorably impressed—in fact, was highly pleased to see such free thought, so many progressiv ideas, such clear and logical reason, in print and in public circulation, and I must say, press on. It is the means to an end that is necessary, as it is self-evident it is making life a success. W. M. MEYERSIECK.

JASPER, ALA., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Why is it a fact that people will not reason? If all were honest and would closely observe facts, with an enlightened intellect we could come to the same conclusions. There are two kinds of facts. One is apparent, which makes the sun go around the earth once in twenty-four hours; but the real fact is that the earth revolves to produce this result. Apparent facts make theories, but real facts make science. The greater part of our conclusions are based on apparent facts, and not on the real or true facts. This is why we do not agree in our reasoning. Real or a true understanding of facts will always lead to science or demonstration; this should be our object in all branches of thought.

J. K. DEARTH.

CHARLESTON, VT., June 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am getting disgusted with illiberal Liberals. I hav spent several days' time distributing those papers, and hav sent some out of the state, but I do not know as I hav got one subscriber. Yet it may be like casting bread upon the water, to return after many days. I think that there is nothing that has so dwarfed the human mind as the Christian religion. Whether there ever was such a man as Christ or not I neither know nor care. But one thing I do know, that the pretended sayings of his in that old Jew-book hav caused more misery and suffering and bloodshed—yes, a thousand times more—than everything else in the last two thousand years. But this much I can testify to as true, in my own family and neighborhood, as the effect of the Christian religion. Matt. x, 34, 35: "Think not that I come to send peace, but a sword. For I come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law."

Please find inclosed $2 for the picture book.

OTFORD, N. S., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: New ground has again been broken in Nova Scotia, by Mr. Watts delivering two lectures here, Wednesday and Thursday, June 18th and 19th. This, as I think you hav heard before, is a very orthodox town, and the ministers and leaders of churches and Young Men's Christian Associations did their best to keep the members of their congregations, etc., away by reporting that the lectures would be nothing but ridicule and abuse. Probably they thought Mr. Watts was the same stamp of a man as Clark Braden, whom they got to lecture last fall, and who, report says, told the ministers, etc., not to hav anything to do with Mr. Watts, as he would only lead them out beyond their depth, and they would be left there. However, in spite of admonitions, etc., there were quite large audiences, and even the most orthodox were surprised, and expressed great satisfaction at the eloquent, logical, fair, and gentlemanly way in which Mr. Watts handled the subjects of "Christianity vs. Secularism," and "Unbelief." Discussion and criticism were invited, but as the clergy were conspicuous by their absence, no opposition was offered.

ONE OF THE COMMITTEE.

PORT ANGELES, WASH., June 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Our society here is growing larger and more interesting. Dr. F. S. Lewis delivered an instructiv lecture last Sunday evening at the school-house, subject, "The Origin of Life on the Earth." The doctor ably replied to all who criticised his position. There is a Congregationalist church here, and prospects of a Catholic church soon being built. Port Angeles is situated similarly to New York city or San Francisco, and is destined to soon become a great city, a great power for either good or evil, truth or superstition. Some of the Liberals here were deluded into helping build the Congregational church, with the understanding that we could use it for Liberal meetings when the Christians were not using it, and what they learned by the experiment they might hav learned a great deal cheaper in THE TRUTH SEEKER if they had studied it carefully.

We respectfully invite all Liberals who come to western Washington to come to Port Angeles, and hope that many of them will make their homes here and join us in building a city as free from superstition as possible. I will send for a cartoon book before long, and hope you will soon hav the Bible cartoons in book form. The cartoons should also be in tract form, which would enable us to send a few to many places where we could not afford to send books.

FRANK MORSE.

EAGLE, NEB., June 24, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I could not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, even if times are hard. I hav tried to get a few subscribers, but hav failed, but I will try again. They are so bigoted and narrow-minded, and you cannot convince an old person of his errors. But I hav great hopes of the rising generation, as Freethought is catching. I liv near a German Lutheran church and parochial school, and all the parents' children that belong to this church are growing up with a bigoted education. We hav had a good public school before this church was built here, and more good-will and harmony among the people than there is now. I hav heard the preacher denounce the public schools from the pulpit as schools of the devil, godless schools. Now, if this is not Anarchism, I do not know what it is. They are endeavoring to destroy our schools of learning, as Christianity cannot propagate its isms where there is learning. As soon as the people are better educated they will discard religion, and of course that means minus bread and butter to the sky-pilot. Our free school must be maintained by all hazards, with no interference of God, priest, or devil. Talk about Christian love, why, there is no such thing. Right here in this church, on the last night of the old year 1889, two prominent church lights nearly got into a hand-to-hand fight, and if it were not for the interference of other members, they would hav had a Sullivan-Kilrain fight, with God as referee. O ye vipers and hypocrits! If there is a person that can lie, it is a hypocrit Christian. O. R. BOESEWETTER.

DELAVAN, MINN., June 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just received a series of Liberal lectures from that great and gifted man, J. E. Remsburg, on the nights of June 17th, 18th, and 19th. I attended every night. I work out in the country three miles from town. I was lucky enough to get a ride into town the first two evenings. Notwithstanding it rained Thursday and I had to walk if I attended, I walked, and felt fully repaid in listening to the lecture, the subject of which was, "The Apostle of Liberty." There was one lady who told another she was a fool to go near the lecture. "I never go near 'um! I never would go near 'um! I won't hav nothing to do with 'um!" But for all this advice she did attend—every night, too. And another lady threatened to lock her husband out if he went a second evening. And yet there were others more charitable in their views, not hesitating to say, "We should hear both sides of the subject."

I hav read some of the writings of Thomas Paine, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, J. E. Remsburg, Helen Gardener, John Peck, and others. I think the ideas we receive from such literature are far in advance of those we hear from the pulpit.

Fraternally, EVA R. LEE.

BOWIE, TEX., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I receive the grand old TRUTH SEEKER regularly, and sometimes I think it should be named the Truth Finder.

Freethought is moving here. We organized yesterday, the 22d, with about ten members; elected president and secretary, and will be known as the Bowie Freethought Society. We expect to send a delegate to the state Liberal convention at Waco, Tex., July 15 to 17, 1890.

We hav a small town of about twenty-five hundred population, but four joss-houses find customers and as many sky-pilots find a good, easy living at the expense of the ignorant and superstitious.

On Friday, the 20th inst., Dr. James Billings, Universalist missionary, got permission to deliver a series of sermons at the Christian joss-house. He preached on Friday night and Saturday was notified that he could hav the house no longer. The fact is, he taught them from the Bible that the chances were that the majority of them would go to heaven, and only a few, in fact none, would go to hell. This was too much for the Christians. If they were not going to hell he could not preach in their joss-house, as it did not suit them.

I esteem THE TRUTH SEEKER very highly, and think it the grandest exponent of the falsity of superstition. You hav penetrated into the gloomy recesses of Catholicity and bigotry, and hav banished it from the minds of thousands. Welcome, TRUTH SEEKER, and may your example be followed by your successors. Continue the pictures.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, S. P. BENTON.

RICEVILLE, IOWA, June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Heston deserves infinit credit for the good work he does with his pictures. Each one of them is as good as a volume. I am specially well pleased with his pictures of June 7th, "A Few of the Fraudulent Relics Exhibited to the Faithful." It is immense. Said picture brings old facts to my mind. In the year 1844 the coat o Christ—or the "Holy Lord God's Coat," as we used to call it in Germany—was on exhibition in Fraves, or Frier. My mother was one of the many thousands of pilgrims who walked to Fraves, a distance of about forty miles from where we lived at the time, to receive the blessing and indulgence which were granted to those who were permitted to see and touch the holy coat. Every one of the visitors was obliged to giv a certain sum of money. My mother and others said that there was more than a wagon-load of money on the altar where the coat was exhibited. It was a bonanza for the church. At the time, my father made the remark that there was no more efficacy in Christ's coat, which he doubted to be genuin, than in his own coat. For this offense he was promptly ordered before the priest to get a lecture for this terrible blasphemy.

All my brothers and sisters and relativs are Roman Catholics They dislike me on account of my Infidelity. But I let them cling to the old superstition and falsehood, and I will stick to Liberalism and the truth.

I feel perfectly happy now, but in olden times, when I was a Christian, I was always miserable. The idea of swallowing the creator of heaven and earth, God, man, and all—such cannibalism was against my nature.

I hav been trying hard to get a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but in vain. There are a few so called half Freethinkers in this town, but they dare not take a Liberal paper for fear it would make them unpopular. There are four churches in this little town, and most of the folks go to church for society's sake.

I want to make a suggestion to all Christians of the world. Let them organize a congress, and enter into an agreement to take a trial term of Freethought and Liberalism, say for ten years. Let them discard all Gods and religions and churches Let them allow the priests and preachers to take care of themselvs for ten years. Let the Christians—or apprentice Liberals—organize Secular Unions and Liberal libraries in every town to take the place of churches. Let them purchase Liberal and scientific books to take the place of Bibles and hymn-books. Let them invest the same amount of money toward educating themselvs and children as they used to invest in churches and priests. And at the end of ten years let them look around and see the result. If the people hav intellectually and morally advanced, then let them keep science and Liberalism; if they hav fallen, then let them go back to priestcraft and ignorance.

This world wants more such men as R. G. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett, Horace Seaver, Thomas Paine, and others, to take the place of preachers and priests. This world wants more science and truth, and less superstition and religion.

HENRY BISSON.

BOSCOBEL, WIS., June 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Error is born to falter upon the borders of truth, serving only to mislead and corrupt the human race; and the widest scope of its action may readily be traced through all known time to the characteristics and acts of religious organisms.. This self-constituted evil came early, and paved its way by plea of piety to universal control, finally issuing over the world in race contention and wide-spread destruction. Fortunately glimpses of light and happiness, heralded stage by stage by the growth of intelligence adverse to the characteristics of the prevailing religions, came upon the scene, which ultimately has brought our latter centuries to conditions grandly hopeful as to the future of our race, in that that rational liberty, universally distributed, shall be enlarged and made good for all time. Truth, then, would ever prevail, and would ever be the world's handmaid of social unity.

Following my introductory statement, in the main relating to prehistoric race conditions, it has occurred to me in this direction, that a fresh point bearing upon God's alleged interest and responsibility in the human race may be worthy of note, inasmuch as truly sensible and rational people do not hesitate to condemn the Bible Adam and Eve story as bogus. First, then, we are informed that God's power is infinit; that he created all things to his own liking, the human race especially as to liking. This allegation reminds one of Darwin's prehistoric half-bred, evoluted man-monkies whom God deposited—to his own liking—on earth to lead the van of all possible humanities then yet to appear on earth, their forms, natures, and characters included. Well! Starting upon the original and considering the countless issues of subsequent differentials of the race, one is again reminded of the fact, that infinit power, adorned with infinit judgment and taste, had discounted its abilities in construction, at its first trial. Bogus again!

Summarily given in a business way, it should appear that at the prehistoric period mentioned, God, if there—being infinit as a person, he must hav been there—neglected his chosen, functionary trust, the crown of all life, by letting stolid ignorance capture all of humanity that might follow on the earth, thus making himself responsible—infinitly so—for whatever in human evil might follow in consequence. Then, to think how easy it would hav been for him to hav placed highest intelligence there instead in order to forecast the growth of social good, in surety.

Considered as business, was ever so great a mistake launched so carelessly upon the world? Having the power, would not a clod-headed farmer do better? Surely Bible history and religious asseverations hav ever been paltering or deceiving at the expense of truth and in the face of piety.

A word farther. The world's one thousand religious sects are so constituted as to make it impossible for any one or al of them to rightly claim any relation whatever to any form of godlike power. To me the entire scheme appears only as organisms seeking and contending for greatest power, severally; added to an equal desire to attain grandeur in position, to be so elevated by the "mammon of unrighteousness." I hav never been able to locate God. Monism tenders the closest view. D.

MOSCOW, IDA., June 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I read THE TRUTH SEEKERS and pass them around in the missionary circuit as best I can. The effect of conversion from superstition to humanity and falsehood to truth, from illogicalness to logic, is very slow; and I can not see why it should not be faster, for when I was superstitious, it did not require but two or three copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the same number of Ingersoll's lectures to regenerate me from the low rut of superstition, hypocrisy, cowardice, and blind faith—which are the four leading elements of the Christian religion. I liv in the eastern part of the new state of Washington. The people are eccentric in the many beliefs. Some are out-spoken Infidels. In the fifteen months I hav lived here I attended one funeral. The man that stood between God almighty and common people on this occasion, called minister of Christ's gospel, informed the mourners that the case of the little innocent was only a mere change, no annihilation of life by any means; that their Lord said suffer little children to come unto him and forbid them not, for he was a loving God, etc. I wondered why his love was not great enough to let the parents keep the child and obviate all grief. I cannot conceive how people can trust their near and dear to the tender care and nurture of a God that allured an innocent and virtuous woman, as far as we know, as he did the Virgin Mary, and then through stratagem or chicanery palmed her off, child and all, onto poor Joe. Doubtless the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav heard of the song of Foolish Joe. I think he was the fellow. I think the correctest way of proving a man's manhood is, in the event of doing wrong either by accident or intention, to beg pardon and make amends as far as is in such man's power. Gods are not excepted from the same rule. Instead of this God marrying this betrayed virgin, and swearing he would protect her, if his relativ ostracised and disinherited him, he does quite the opposit.

How much longer are people to be bamboozled by such humbuggery? I think that all Liberals should report themselvs and volunteer to contribute, ever so little, to the great cause of human freedom. I hav heard Christians say if it was in their power they would imprison our great apostle, Colonel Ingersoll. The great work rests in teaching the Liberal sentiment into the people, as the sentiment of the people is generally carried in the laws, let them be good or bad, oppressiv or liberal. If men want to harvest or thrash on Sunday they are not persecuted. Petitions were signed here last winter against the Blair bill and giving one religion advantage of another. This state is doing some good Liberal political work, as has been reported by C. B. Reynolds. We want all church property taxed and not a person paid by the public tax for their time spent in prayer, from United States chaplain in the Senate to school-teacher. If the superstitious want to waste their time in such nonsense, let them do it at their own expense. If there is a future and better existence for people, managed by a deity, I would rather think it an Infidel sentiment than an orthodox sentiment, because we advocate better principles. And should there be a reckoning up at a judgment day and the boss God—him or it, or what is proper to say in this particular; perhaps John Peck or some one can answer; you all know what I mean—should be an Infidel in every sense, and suppose the same bigoted, inhuman principles should be carried out on the Christians that their God is carrying out on us for unbelief, would the Christian not wish he had embraced Infidelity? Is it not as logical for us to reason about what we do not know anything about as it is for them?

I will hav to take issue with Bloomer and others on Prohibition. It is nothing rare to see defenseless women and children in this country in more or less trouble and distress, and men's faces black and blue, the effect of the saloon and gambling table. Stamp me in favor of woman suffrage and the suppression of drunkenness. JOEL MCCALLISTER.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., June 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. Mr. Hurly, in a sermon delivered recently at the Centenary Methodist Episcopal church to a crowded house, assailed the character of the Atheist in a very vindictiv manner. The inclosed letter was written in reply thereto, and presented to the home paper for publication, which, however, was unceremoniously refused.

W. E. WALTON.

REV. MR. HURLY, KEYTESVILLE, MO., Dear Sir: I wish to assure you at the outset that I mean no offense by the folfowing, and should you take any exception to the same, I trust that you will be kind enough to practice your theory of forgivness until seventy times seven in this case, as I feel assured you will do. My object is to submit a few criticisms on your late exposition of the character of an Atheist. You take the position, in fact you affirm positivly, that the intelligent Atheist, or person that rejects God—you mean Jehovah, of course—has no conscience. The term conscience is not ambiguous. It means simply man's conception of right and wrong. Hence the idea of an intelligent Atheist having no conscience is ludicrous, absurd. Man to possess a conscience must of necessity be intelligent. No one knows this any better than yourself. I am willing to concede that you possess a conscience, that you hav an acute perception of right and wrong, but I am not sure that you are not altogether remorseless and therefore without a proper respect for your conscience. You appear willing to impeach the motiv of every generous deed, and of every noble achievement, and to deny and discredit all evidence of an honorable, just, and upright spirit, exhibited on the part of an Atheist. And why? It certainly cannot be simply for the purpose of smirching and blacking his character in the estimation of his Christian neighbors. I hav never committed a crime in my life which if brought to the light of day would be cognizable by any sort of justice, unless it be an occasional desecration of the Sabbath, and this alleged offense is answerable only to a court of injustice. I hav a few friends with whom I am intimately associated who hav evidenced their friendship by years of unswerving fidelity and faithfulness. No one with whom I ever had any business transactions has ever indicated a want of confidence in my integrity. I hav endeavored to be an exemplifier of all that was pure and good, and my highest ambition has been to accumulate a competence for my family and to instruct my children in the principles of justice and truth. But alas, I am suddenly seized up by a veritable Torquemada, fired into a flame by the smoldering spirit of the Holy Spanish Inquisition. He sounds the note of alarm, "Look out, brethren, for that awful Atheist! He has no conscience! If he treats you kindly, it is simply a cunning device by which he expects to be treated kindly in return. If he pays dollar for dollar it is because he desires that you should treat him in like manner. And this is all very foolish and sinful."

Did it ever occur to you, my dear brother, that your entire scheme of Christian piety is underlaid with the most sordid and selfish of motivs, with a superficial, but most transparent covering of purple and tinsel? Is it not declared that Christ had respect to the recompense that he should receive, in consideration of which he sacrificed his own body? However, a just recompense or reward was exactly what the Christian did not want, and it is to escape justice that he clings so tenaciously to the cross. Hear an apostle on this subject: "If the words spoken by angels were steadfast and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompensc or reward, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" Escape what? A just recompense or reward. So to Christ they fly, and he becomes a party to a general conspiracy to rob justice of its victim and thus shield the malefactor from a justly deserved punishment. The upright Atheist is just, and desires only that justice be meted out to him in return. The Christian, aided and abetted by his divine savior, expects to escape justice. I pity, and would pray for if I thought it would do any good, the man that can vindictivly assail the untarnished character of an Atheist simply because it was developed independent of church influence; that will contend without a blush that he can trespass against his brother until seventy times seven, that he can maltreat and abuse him, and like the typical David of old commit the darkest and most infamous crimes, and then at any moment turn to the savior, who will graciously absolve him from all guilt. Herein lies the difference between the Christian and myself. I believe that I must answer at the inexorable bar of justice for my conduct. The Christian contends that he has a city of refuge that will shield him from the consequence of his evil conduct. Now, to put the question squarely, could you look with an eye of approval on the minister that would giv a pressing invitation for everybody to attend service at his church, and then after the congregation had assembled and everyone was observing the very strictest decorum, affect an air of sacerdotal gravity and assail with the vilest aspersions and imputations the character of the Atheist, not for any alleged immoral conduct, not for the habitual practice of any known vice, but simply because he did not happen to hav the acceptable faith in regard to something, or perhaps nothing, that no one knows anything about?

The best I can say for most Christians is that they are in many things better than their creeds. But I believe you will admit that the individual whose spring of life is constantly bubbling over with acts of kindness and expressions of sympathy for suffering humanity; whose inherent love of truth and justice develops a splendid, upright character; one who practices virtue for its own dear sake without fear of punishment or hope of reward, is infinitly superior to the abnormal, apathetic, frigid nature that can only be moved to acts of kindness and expressions of sympathy by the spectacle of a crucified and mangled savior, supplemented by the fear of a burning hell and an intense longing for a crown of glory and a harp of gold.

I must confess myself highly gratified by these suicidal spasms of righteous indignation. I believe they hav always been characteristics of the Christian clergy throughout the world. They hav a strong tendency to disintegrate the organized forces of orthodoxy. Not long since, a practicing physician, one that stands high in the profession and is widely known throughout the country, told me that he had lately been engaged in reading the Bible through, and as a result had come to the conclusion that preaching was simply a profession, and that he had become so disgusted with clerical arrogance and censorship during the time that Mr. Bell rode the Keytesville circuit that he had scarcely been inside of a church since. I am personally acquainted with perhaps a score of similar cases, all of them above the average for intelligence. They hav had the theological chimeras extracted from their craniums and their minds freed from a state of servil superstitious bondage that has become utterly intolerable since the broad expanse of intellectual freedom has opened out before their extended vision.

Respectfully, W. E. WALTON.

MARENGO, ILL., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In yours of June 21st Mr. F. E. Ormsby says that "the readers of Mr. Wettstein's challenge to mediums, in yours of May 31st, were no doubt impressed at first with the idea that they were to receive some light on the much discussed subject of slate-writing by disembodied spirits," and furthermore that my inviting witnesses to note proceedings at the sitting was evidence "that he is a coward, afraid of that which he claims does not exist," etc. According to these sage observations, I presume he fancies that I desired the presence of these witnesses to guard against a possible onslaught of the spirits who should happen to put in an appearance. He is evidently not aware that I am well fortified against such assaults, not knowing that a few well-directed invocations of the blessed Virgin will put them to rout, not to say anything of two or three amulets and talismans I habitually wear to keep them at a safe distance. I am now referring to "those evil spirits," to quote his own words, "designated by many, on account of the results that sometimes follow, as the devil!" But, seriously speaking, when I endeavored to "throw some light on the much discussed slate-writing manifestations," I did not hav the hardihood to expect that such light could ever dawn upon intelligences which could construe my proposition of having witnesses present as cowardice, and it would therefore be a waste of time and of printers' ink to take cognizance of his other inanities; in fact, if I thought it necessary to exculpate myself from so grave a charge as that of being afraid of spooks I didn't believe in, it might be looked upon as a serious reflection upon the intelligence of your readers.

I would only remark en passant that I am still patiently awaiting the arrival of his promised "whalers carrying the fisher-mediums hitherward on their errand of capturing the fish that are caught by mediumistic frauds." But as the "catch" is counted by the thousands, and mostly among his own clan, methinks he ought to look in a different direction for it. But pending the arrival of his "whalers," I would advise him to rest from his mental labors, lest his overwrought spirit will disembody itself from its "fleshly tabernacle" to take unto itself wings for spirit-land. His frantic effort in expounding metaphorical spirit-lore certainly seems to render such a precaution highly necessary.

Turning our attention to page 394, same issue, we are confronted with the following questions propounded by Mr. J. Brown, in reply to mine of May 3d: "What created matter? Did it always exist, or does it contain some inherent element or principle of procreation?" Replying I would say that what we conceive as matter is the temporarily condensed cosmic force pervading space, which our crude senses are not able to resolve into their true nature of aggregated force-centers, and is eternal, hence was not created. This cosmic force is the Atheist's God, having the power, like the Theist's fancied personal God, of procreating the multifarious forms into which it aggregates. I agree with him in saying that "there is no beginning without a force, spirit (i.e., intelligence), or what you may call it, to enforce that beginning." This averment is generally understood as necessitating a creator, but if correctly interpreted shows that instead of Theists and Atheists being directly opposed in their doctrins, they really can join hands fraternally across the imaginary chasm that separates them. The beginning of every formation of matter, the Atheist admits, implies a creator, but this creator is immanent within their very components, having the potentiality to arrange them in accordance with their primitiv judgment and requirements, and the capacity to adapt them to surrounding conditions or influences. In other words, "No beginning without an incentiv force," is the Atheist's doctrin in regard to the eternal mutations of cosmic force or matter which had a beginning in each of their individual forms they perpetually assume through their own creativ force. This force itself, however, is as eternal and immutable as the Theist's God. The terms "Atheist" and "Infidel" are misnomers therefore, they recognizing a creator—call it God, nature, or the creativ force of the universe—and being infidel to nothing but the God of superstition. Scientists agree that cosmic force is all-sufficient to produce every phenomenon and every form of animate and inanimate life; is it therefore not a manifest absurdity to add a God to it, an act of supererogation born of ignorance? Is one god not sufficient, the only real, true god of cosmic force? True, we do not yet comprehend the exact nature of this creativ force, but has the church from time immemorial not thrown every conceivable obstacle in the way of those who endeavored to ascertain its nature? Of its potentiality none can hav any doubt, as we behold it all around and within us, but of the Theist's additional God there is not a particle of evidence. And is it not the hight of folly to assume one, considering that it saddles us with the still greater mystery of his being or origin? Does it not complicate difficulties by adding a God to the universe, instead of simplifying them? Hav we not two existences to account for then, God and the universe, instead of that of the latter only? The latter we know exists; then let us discover the true nature of the force that caused its various formations, but in the name of common sense don't let us add a vastly greater mystery to it, a mystery based on purest assumption, without a vestige of reason to support it.

But, noting your correspondent's further remarks, how innocently can a child not fondle with a diamond in the rough without realizing its value! He says: "The improvements [or researches] into the electric fluid may lead to the discovery of that unknown God." My dear sir; it is it! it is your God! You hav it right there in your grasp! Your "unknown God" is embodied right within what you call electric fluid, the sparkle of its luster being still hidden from our mental gaze by the incrustation of our ignorance. Polarity, the dual principle of electricity or magnetism, must indeed be the principal characteristic of atoms or force-centers and the main factor, through its attraction and repulsion, of all we behold in nature. Add to this property the incomprehensibly low degree of consciousness, called by Edison the primitiv judgment of atoms, and also their probable sexuality, as being identical in its nature with polarity, and a theory is formulated that can explicate every phenomenon, through the processes of evolution, from the mind and sex of organic beings to the infinit worlds gyrating through space. No chance, therefore, in all we behold; no fortuitous, hap-hazard throwing together of dead matter, the Theist's scornful imputation against Materialism, but all the result of the tiny monad's choice. With this primitiv atomic judgment recognized by scientists (which I elucidated over ten years ago), with this electiv affinity of force established, what need is there to postulate a supervising and supernatural creator? Recognizing the all-sufficiency of nature in the primitiv judgment of her constituents, is an auxiliary being in the shape of a supposed God therefore not a perfectly useless and superfluous adjunct? The unrestrained forces of nature when on their terrific and merciless exploits of destruction resulting in Johnstown cataclysms, Ashtabula horrors, cyclones and earthquakes destroying human beings by the thousands, and the endless woe and misery to which humanity is subject, indeed preclude its being under providential care, and ought to be sufficient evidence to every unbiased mind that nature acts of its own volition and is not controled by an extraneous guiding hand. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Sweet Pansy.

Would you know what German children
Call this flower dear and sweet?
"Little Stepmother," they name her,
And they tell her tale complete.

Here's the foremost middle petal;
That's the stepmother herself,
And her daughters two beside her,
Just like her each pretty elf.

See, behind, two other petals,
On which different hues are shown,
These are the stepdaughters, always
In the background, and alone.

So, to German children, Pansy
Tells her story o'er and o'er;
And they listen, and they sing it
In a little song once more.

But I love our own name better,
For it sounds more heartsomely;
Sweetest Pansy, dearest Pansy,
She shall always be to me.

—Our Little Ones.

Handsome Is that Handsome Does.

Out of sight, my boys and girls,
Every root of beauty starts;
So think less about your curls,
More about your minds and hearts.
Cherish what is good, and drive
Evil thoughts and feelings far,
For, as sure as you're alive,
You will show for what you are.

—Alice Cary.

Weather Sayings.

The aurora borealis always indicates a change of weather, and if it is very red the weather will be very cold.

A mackerel sky in the west indicates rain. If there be a sheep sky, or white clouds driving to the northwest, it will be fine for some days.

A halo around the moon indicates a coming storm. The number of stars seen within the circle shows the number of days before it will occur.

If the leaves of maples and other trees turn up so as to show their under side it is a sign of rain. Dandelions, tulips, and other flowers close up before rain.

If birds flock together in September it is the sign of a coming storm. If crows are seen going south in the fall it is a sign of colder weather; but if they go north there will be warmer weather.

If there are no falling stars to be seen on a bright summer evening you may look for fine weather. If there be many falling stars on a fine summer's eve you may expect thunder and heavy rain.

"If it thunders in the morning it will be fearful before night." "Winter thunder is to old folks death and to young folks plunder." It is said that persons in consumption hav died during a thunder storm.

If wild geese come from the north early in the fall it is the sign of an early winter. If they go north early in the spring it is a sign that the winter is broken. The Phœbe bird, or pewee, sings before warm weather.

A south wind brings rain, a northeast wind a severe storm, and a northwest wind fair weather. If the wind veers round with the sun, there will be fair weather. If the wind starts up while it is raining, it will blow the rain clouds away, and there will be fair weather.

When you feel the dew falling heavily in the evening you may be sure it will be fair next day. When in the morning you see the ground covered with webs, covered with dew, and dew on the ground around, it is a sign of rain before night, for the spiders are putting up umbrellas.

A halo around the sun indicates that there will be rain or snow soon. If the sun rises clear and soon goes into a cloud it will rain before night. If the sun shines while it rains it will rain the next day. A sun dog, or mock sun, indicates that there will be stormy weather very soon.

If rain commences before daylight it will hold up before 8 P.M. If it begins about noon it will continue through the afternoon. If not till 5 P.M. it will rain through the night. If it commences after 9 P.M. it will rain the next day. If it clears off in the night it will rain the next day.

Frogs and tree-toads peep before rain. If a leech be kept in a glass jar partly filled with water, while it lies curled up at the bottom of the jar there will be fair weather, but before rain, wind, or snow it will be agitated, and will rise to the surface, and if it comes entirely out of the water you may expect thunder.

Before rain ants are bustling and activ, and will carry their eggs from place to place; bees are busy, but do not go far from their hives; crickets sing and try to get into the house; flies are very annoying, and bite sharper than usual; and spiders spin gossamer webs in the air. If ants clear their hole and pile the dust high before 11 A.M. it will be fair the rest of the day.—Boston Journal.

Why Throw It Away?

"Evil is wrought by want of thought, and not by want of heart," wrote the poet. On Saturday more than five thousand pounds of fresh fish were thrown away in one of our city markets on the presumption that it would spoil before the Monday purchasers arrived Why was not some one thoughtful enough to distribute this food—which when cast away was in perfect condition—to the starving poor of the city; to the gaunt, hungry cloakmakers who are suffering in their terrible struggle for decent wages? It would hav helped them one day's journey farther along the difficult road to independence.—Morning Journal.

"Under Nationalistic rule such an act as the above could not hav happened," writes a friend. True. When the relations of the brotherhood of the human race are established there will be no "starving poor," no "gaunt, hungry cloakmakers," or any other persons, suffering for the actual necessaries of life that others may loll in idleness and luxury. Humanity is in a semi-barbaric condition, ignorant and untutored, or these conditions could not exist to-day. May the time hasten when the brute will be eliminated from the human being, and he will come to realize that he only truly livs who livs not for himself alone, but for all—when he will look beyond the narrow boundary of a selfish circle into the broad expanse of a picturesque heaven—a heaven not far off but close at hand, and within his reach. S. H. W.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

It was the little girl's first visit to a dairy farm. "Uncle Zeb," she asked, "which one of all your cows givs the most milk?" Uncle Zeb was a truthful man. He laid one hand on "Old Crumplehorn," carelessly placed the other on the pump, and said, "This one, child."

Not many years ago a gentleman had taken affectionate leave of his wife and daughter for a three months' trip abroad. The child, a lovely girl of two and a half years, stood by a chair with her thumb in her mouth—a favorit pastime, and to her a panacea for all childish ills. She watched her mother for a few moments, saw the tears filling the lovely eyes and dropping one by one from her cheeks, then went to her side with a comforting tone, and looking pityingly up to her face, said, "Mamma, suck 'oo fum!"

"What do you want, Johnny?" said an Elm street drug man to an urchin counter-high. "Something to keep moths out of carpets?" "Yes," answered the boy; "that's what I camphor."

Dickie, six years old, had a pair of boots. He cut one of them with a hatchet. The father became very angry and scolded incessantly. The little fellow looked his father in the face and said, "If you don't stop talking you'll get me mad, too."

Correspondence.

COALING, ALA., June 29, 1890.

MISS S. H. WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. I like your "Corner Gospel"—that in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 21st is splendid. I hav read with much interest "In Search of a Spirit," and McArthur's replies. Here are two men, talented, honest, and sincere, both Liberals, yet they see things so differently that burning would not change them; rationally considered, is this not a powerful argument against a revelation? This is not all. Some cannot see colors alike, some cannot understand words alike. It is a hard thought to know we shall be annihilated, yet it seems to be a fact. Some reason like this: The butterfly was once a caterpillar, but does it know it? The cabbage is converted into living tissue, but does it appreciate or know the change? Is the person as comfortable and happy that has had a member amputated after as before it was diseased? Would not the spirit be miserable without its house? It seems from the reading of that "holy book" that heaven is not just all right for the saints until they get their bodies. Another thought—it would seem that McArthur had bestowed a good deal of thought on Freethought subjects, yet he has not evoluted much past orthodoxy; then how long will it take the orthodox, for they don't try? It seems Liberals hav a herculean task, yet we will hope. When the French nation brought the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena, they esteemed it an honor to declare him the greatest warrior of ancient or modern times. We can claim more—one of our leaders (Ingersoll) has even made war on the Gods, and will in time dethrone them. We are looking forward with interest to the state meeting of Liberals of Texas. I will close, hoping all our actions may be as footprints on the sands of time, that may cause some one to take courage and climb to hights sublime.

J. HAROLD WARD.

[It is well that we differ in our opinions. If all thought just alike, the world would be a dull place. While we hav a right to our own views, let us always respect the opinions of others, remembering that they hav the same right to them as we hav to ours.

Mr. McArthur is a candid, upright, sincere, and honorable gentleman. He may hav some light that others cannot hav by nature of their organization. The editor of the Corner cherishes profound respect for his honest convictions.—ED. C. C.]

Science Column.

Pretty Polly.

"Polly" is a bird that can talk! It is very funny, truly. And the queerest of all queer birds is the parrot, because it can talk.

There are three hundred species of these odd birds, and they are found in great numbers in warm climates, although they can be easily acclimated and thrive well, when caged, in cool countries.

Some varieties are exceedingly handsome, the plumage being brilliant and beautiful, and many of them exhibit remarkable power in imitating not only different fowls and animals, but also the human voice, their thick, fleshy, black tongue enabling them to articulate words distinctly.

Parrots hav a firm, strong bill, arched, and the lower mandible is notched at the end. They can bite terribly, and without seeming effort will draw blood on the adventurous stranger who may attempt to caress them when they are not in the humor for familiarity. They hav two toes in front and two at the back of the foot; when they walk the toes turn in and they present a most ludicrous appearance, but they are great climbers, and can get to the tip-top of a tree or a house even, in short order. They can also fly well. When they eat, they hold their food in the right claw, and are fond of fruits with seeds; they also like grain, nuts, pastry, corn, rice, and occasionally a bit of beefsteak or a chicken bone, which latter they will pick quite clean.

The paroquet, macaw, lory, and cockatoo belong to the parrot tribe, but these do not speak words. Parrots are monogamous, that is, they hav one mate and remain always faithful to that one. On account of their intelligence and cuteness they hav sometimes been called "feathered monkeys."

There is a kind of parrot called the "love birds." These are small in size and noted for their affection and devotion to their mates. The gray parrot, found in West Africa, is the most remarkable talker, and this kind has been taught to repeat long sentences, the whole of the alphabet, and can sing songs. Some green parrots can do nearly if not quite as well.

In a wild state they make their nests in a hollow tree.

Parrots sometimes seem to realize the meaning of the words they utter, will say "What?" in answer to a question, and then reply with intelligence. They hav great memory, can call the names of the various members of the family with whom they liv, and make themselvs very amusing to big folks as well as little ones.

They attain to great age, seventy-five or a hundred years if well cared for, and the older they grow the more they know.

My parrot is a nativ of South America, and was brought to me as a present by a sea-captain who is now dead. His name is Robert, but is often called "Polly," which is a nickname for all parrots.

He is attached to me, and will kiss and caress me with his bill, being very careful not to hurt me.

He will scold at my sister because she has been obliged to chastise him with a stick sometimes when he has been naughty.

He will crow and cackle like the hens, will whistle, bark like a dog, mew like a cat, chatter like a monkey, and talk like a human being. He calls "mother," "papa," "Susie," "Bridget," "Polly, pretty Polly," "Polly wants some dinner," "Get up! It's 5 o'clock," "Stop your noise," "Mind your p's and q's," "Hello there," "Does your mother know you're out?" and many other words and short sentences. He will call "John! John! John!" which is the name of the coachman across the street, and in such a natural tone that John runs hurriedly into the house to see what is wanted, when Robert laughs "Ha, ha, ha," and screams and laughs again, as if he perfectly understood that he was playing a joke on poor John.

Sometimes Robert will cry and whimper like a child, and again he will scold, and say, "I'll whip you—inch of your life!" He is jealous, and grows very indignant if his mistress happens to pet a little girl in his presence, or fondle a kitten or dog. When little Susie was alive, he would pull her hair whenever he had a chance, thinking she received too much attention, or more than was given to him. Once he bit the dog because he came too near his perch, and said, "There! take that!"

He would eat with the cat, when we owned a cat, but would whip her with his beak if she became too greedy. When he is out on the lawn, he will feed the sparrows who creep through the bars of his cage, dropping bits of bread for them to pick up.

Joe, the colored man who livs in our family, said once, "Dere's no use talkin', Miss Susan, dese yere parrots are de ole-fashioned folkses—dere our great granfaders."

I once heard of a parrot who caused some trouble in a store, where he was allowed the privilege of walking about. His master lost a half sovereign, and accused the shop girl of taking it. She indignantly denied the accusation. But the man still had suspicion of her, and intentionally left another coin upon his desk, which also disappeared. He tried several coins in this way, with the same result.

Finally, he had the girl arrested, and brought before a magistrate. She escaped conviction, and begged her master to try the coin business once more, and keep a strict watch. He did so, and was astonished to see the parrot watch his chance and slyly appropriate the coin and drop it in a hole in the floor.

Investigation brought all the lost coins to light, besides thimbles, and many small articles that the mischievous bird had dropped in the hole in the floor at various times.

QUESTIONS.—How many species of parrots? Where are they found? What remarkable power do they possess? What enables them to talk? Describe beak and toes and general appearance. What is their principal food? What varieties are there that do not speak words? What peculiarity belongs to parrots? What are they called sometimes? What of the "love birds?" What of the gray parrot? Tell what you remember of Robert. What was Joe's remark concerning parrots? Relate the work of a mischievous parrot. Tell what you may know of parrots that hav come under your own observation.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

THE emperor of Austria has with difficulty made peace between the Bohemians and Germans in the province of Bohemia. Dissensions between the three races that compose his empire, Slav, German, and Hungarian, giv him perpetual trouble. It is to be hoped that America will assimilate her breeds better, and escape such conflicts.

THE cholera in Spain is being promptly put down, thanks to a displacement of ecclesiastical by scientific remedies.

AT Louisville, Ky., a Fourth of July picnic party in a wagon were struck by a locomotiv, and three killed and nine badly injured.

AMONG the accidents of the Fourth the most considerable was the mangling of six men by powder placed in a tree, at Tower City, Pa.

AN incendiary fire destroyed the large M. E. church at Manasquan, N. J., on the night of the 4th, the culprits being believed to be members who seceded from the church and established a new one at a split a few months ago.

ABOUT 2,000 of the Order of Railway Conductors, being opposed to strikes, hav seceded and formed an Independent Order with declarations against striking.

THE bill to place Congressional and other national elections in charge of federal supervisors, has passed the House notwithstanding Democratic opposition, and will be voted on by the Senate soon.

THE anniversary of the inauguration of Bruno's statue was commemorated by some societies by visiting it and depositing a wreath of flowers. The brass star that was stolen from the permanent bronze wreath was replaced.

DR. WINDTHORST, leader of the Catholic faction in the German parliament, makes his party's support of the army bill that the kaiser is anxious to carry, conditional on their being granted their own primary schools.

CHIEF CROWLEY of the San Francisco police says that lack of employment is the main cause of prostitution; when the canneries are running there there is a large diminution of arrests for that offense. He thinks that the best remedy for all crime would be some scheme affording all opportunity of work.

NEW JERSEY has enacted a law to prevent the employment of Pinkerton detectivs to quell strikers. It forbids the sheriff of a county, the mayor of a city, or any other person authorized by law to appoint special deputy sheriffs, special constables, marshals, policemen, or other peace officers to appoint as such any person who shall not be a citizen of the state, and no person shall act as a peace officer without having an appointment in writing from a person authorized by law to appoint him.

CARDINAL GIBBONS said in a recent speech at Baltimore: "We must make up our minds that poverty in one shape or another will always exist among us. It is in accordance with the economy of divine providence that men should exist in unequal conditions in society for the exercise of benevolent virtues. Some are blessed with the good things of this world that they might exercise toward their less favored brothers the virtues of charity, benevolence, and generosity. Others are poor that they might practice the virtues of patience and gratitude to their benefactors."

THE reign of superstition begins to yield to a religion of reason and humanity. The first forerunners of that religion appeared at the end of the sixteenth century, when the philosophers of northern Europe first dared to appeal from dogma to nature, and since that revival of common sense the prison walls of clerical obscurantism hav been shaken by shock after shock, till daylight now enters through a thousand fissures.—Prof. Oswald.

For the things, I see their effects all over Christendom; I see a holy alliance, clothed in the robe of orthodoxy and lording it over the rights and reason of man For the words, they are neither weak nor o doubtful import. The scriptural penman, when he writes of doctrins and mysteries, often writes in parables, that we may hear, yet not understand; but when submission to kings and governors is his theme, his words are plain as truth itself. There is nothing left to conjecture, no eastern metaphor to solve, nor dark saying to unriddle. A FEW OF THE "GOOD OLD PATRIARCHS."

Notes and Clippings.

THE arrest of a Kansas City parrot for using profane language is as sensible, says the San Francisco Freethought, as any arrest made for the same offense. To preserve the similarity to other cases of the kind the blasphemous bird should get a long term in jail. It might also be fined.

JESUS is the ideal priest. He is Rome's noblest pattern. His rank prejudice, his colossal conceit, his narrow spirit, his antihuman sympathies, all make him the idol of Roman Catholicism. He is the man-god of the Vatican. He came not to teach, but to rule—not with love and kindness, but with sword and condemnation; not to help and encourage humanity, but to gather it into his kingdom.—Investigator.

TOLSTOI is decidedly of opinion that marriage is not a Christian institution, and calls our attention to the facts that neither Christ nor his disciples married, and that the really devout Christian looks upon wedlock as a sin, and will always avoid it. Just as (giving chapter and verse for it), he says, there can be no Christian liturgy (Matt. vi, 5-12), nor church fathers (Matt. xxiii, 8-10), nor armies, law-courts, or states. Christ's kingdom, as he himself is so often reported to hav said, is not of this world at all; and perhaps, says Secular Thought, the sooner it is relegated to the world to which it rightfully belongs the better it will be for this one.

THE Denison Gazetteer thus refers to some Texas preachers that go about the country playing Moody and Sankey in a sort of cheap way: "The gospel firm of Burnett and Mulkey hav struck their tent on the circus lot and departed for Denton. This combination never blows about its box-office receipts so we are unable to state definitly whether or not the engagement was satisfactory. If the free list was not unusually large, however, there can be no doubt as to its complete success. As to the merits of the attraction the popular verdict conflicts, some stating the management put up a good show, and others, that it was queer, very queer indeed."

IT is explained by a writer in the Popular Science Monthly that there are several causes, other than increase in wrong-doing, for the rapid growth of our prison population in certain parts of our country. One of them lies in the transition from an unsettled condition to a settled condition on our constantly advancing frontier; another is in the change from slavery in the South; and a third is in the gradual elevation of the standard of human conduct, making crimes of actions that had been only lawful escapades in earlier times. Of course, it is obvious that in a new country there will be a certain amount of lawless conduct unpunished at first, before sheriffs, courts, and jails are in running order. But the rapid increase in the proportion of criminals, as the state grows older, does not mean more crime; it often means less. The evil-doers are arrested and sentenced, and so get into our prisons and our census; and then we are told that crime is increasing.

JUNE 2d, Joseph Keeter and Joseph Barnett, of Indianapolis, were fined by Mayor Sullivan for taking photographs on Sunday. The former, with costs, paid $19 50 and the latter paid $13.25. Both were amateurs engaged in taking landscapes. George Wilson and Ruth Keeter were arrested for the same offense, but their cases were continued. Laws that make such things possible ought to be promptly abolished, comments the American Sentinel. We suppose, however, that the Indiana Sunday law is simply a "civil regulation" to "preserve the health of the people" by keeping them from working too hard. Sunday is a very peculiar day. It would no doubt be all right for the mayor of Indianapolis to take his carriage and drive on Sunday, or for any number of people to devote the day to feasting and visiting, but taking photographs of landscapes is not to be tolerated.

THERE is getting to be in America an undesirable frequency of cases of inquisitorial and oppressiv administration. Judge Tuley declares in a letter to a Chicago society that there the police arrest, on bare suspicion and without warrant, persons not found in the act of violating the law; that they undertake to determin who shall and who shall not meet in open public assemblage to discuss political or economic questions; that after one hundred years of liberty in this country a citizen can be arrested without warrant, consigned to a prison cell for eight days (a recent case in connection with a dynamite find at the Haymarket monument), and prevented from communicating with his friends, denied the privilege of consulting with his legal adviser, and not even informed of the accusation against him; and when in answer to a judicial mandate, the door of his prison cell is opened and the officers of the law required to show cause "why this violation of the citizen's personal rights," the chief executiv officer of the police can make "return" to him, to this free man's writ of habeas corpus, that he arrested this citizen upon the letter of an unknown party and detained the citizen in prison while trying to find such unknown party—"a return" the like of which never before disgraced the records of a civilized country.

SAYS J. D. Shaw in the July Independent Pulpit: "The meeting here [at Waco, July 15th] this month will test the working strength, the sacrificing zeal, and the moral courage of Texas Liberalism. As to Infidelity—unbelief in the divinity of the Bible—it exists everywhere, in every county and precinct. Infidels can be numbered by thousands, men and women, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, church members and outsiders, but this cannot be said of Liberalism and Liberals. If we could announce to the managers of railways throughout Texas that one out of every one hundred of the Infidels in this state are expected to attend that meeting, no doubt they would readily extend to us the same reduction in rates of travel that they generally extend to other large gatherings, but this we dare not do. In fact, we are perfectly at sea in attempting to make any estimate upon the number that will attend. It is a sad commentary upon the candor and intellectual honesty of our times when we are forced to believe that there are in fact about ten Infidels—unbelievers—to every Christian believer, in this state and yet not one out of every one hundred of these Infidels is a Liberal. But some one may ask right here: 'Are not all Liberals Infidels?' To this we answer yes; but all Infidels are not Liberals, and that is where our chief difficulty lies."

Communications.

The Religious Condition of Denmark.*

In the year 1026 King Canute the Great undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, and on this occasion Denmark was in religious aspects officially connected with Rome, and henceforward the pope was recognized as a superior by the Danish crown and church. Yet it must not be imagined that the great body of the people, or even the nobility, were actual Christians. The ancient faith continued to hav its adherents, secretly it may be, for centuries to come. When the Reformation shed its light over Germany, a few of its rays reached Denmark, but the advocates of the new faith were bitterly persecuted by the Catholic clergy, and it was when King Frederick III. on the diet of Odense had proclaimed universal toleration that the Lutheran faith first made visible progress. His son, Christian III., confiscated the property of the Roman church and closed the monasteries (1536), and was at the diet of Odense, 1539, declared the head of the Danish-Lutheran state church, an institution which exists yet, and in spite of the constitution of June 5, 1849, which abolishes the state church and introduces the Danish People church.

The king, who, according to the constitution, shall belong to the Evangelic-Lutheran church, is nominally the head of the state church, the affairs of which are since 1884 governed by a church court, consisting of 7 bishops, 1 professor of theology and 1 of laws. Besides these officials the church has 72 archdeacons (provster) and 959 ministers, and about 3,000 minor officials. To the support of these holy men the nation pays yearly between seven and eight million crowns.

It may be asked why the government, in direct violation of the express words of the constitution and of public sentiment, studiously refuses to introduce the People church. The reasons are principally two. The queen of Denmark, a German princess, is very religiously inclined and very influential; she considers herself a mother of the Danish people, and hence is much concerned in their future welfare—as regards the other life—and she fears, and not without reason, that the abolition of the state church and thereby of religious teaching in the schools will bring about a sad change, doubly sad, because not alone will a large number receive no religious instruction whatever, but the loyalty of the nation to her husband and own self will be considerably diminished, a state of affairs royalty cannot afford to bring about. But there is yet another point. The present administration which holds the rudder of the state is heartily disliked by the body of the people, a fact plainly seen in the late returns to Folkethinget (house of representativs), where nine-tenths of the members elected belong to the opposition.

In keeping up the state church the government can at each general election count on four thousand solid clerical votes. These votes it might not receive were the state church abolished; hence its tenacity in keeping this institution alive.

The strong opposition has, however, compelled the government at different times to accede to the demands of the opposition and amend the rigid constitution of the old state church. Thus in 1849 equal civil rights were granted to religious sects outside the state church; but it was as late as 1878 that the same rights were conceded to Infidels, and then chiefly owing to the fact that an Atheist, Edward Brandes, M.D., was repeatedly sent by his constituents to represent them in Folkethinget. The doctor refused to take the oath and to his persistency and the loyalty of his constituents the Danish Freethinkers owe the right of "testifying." In 1857 compulsory baptism was abolished by law; but note the shrewdness of the clerical party. The names of the children hav to be enroled in the church books of their respectiv districts within the year after birth, and thus at each census all Freethinkers that do not expressly declare themselvs as such to the census officer, and their children, are counted as belonging to the Evangelic-Lutheran church. In 1851 civil marriage was granted, and in 1868 there were established "electing communities;" that is, twenty or more families can form an independent community, without leaving the state church, if they can maintain a minister.

Yet the spirit of dissatisfaction has shown itself not alone in the appearance of these "electing communities," but also in the birth of a strong anti-church party for the abolition of the union of church and state, and this party is found in the church itself. I refer to the Lutheran sect known as Grundtvigians, named so after its founder, the late Bishop Grundtvig, who died in 1872. Grundtvig and his followers place the Apostles' creed before and above the Bible; think a great deal of baptismal grace, less of continual preaching, nothing at all of exercise of repentance. The party is anti-German, hence it hates everything that comes from the "Vaterland," makes a great halloo over everything purely Scandinavian, and even wishes to introduce into the schools Norse mythology as introductory to the study of Christianity. It teaches people to enjoy themselvs and take plenty of muscular exercise; hence its nickname, "muscular Christianity." In the census returns the Grundtvigians are, of course, counted as belonging to the state church.

For the maintenance of the clergy, whose salaries range from ten thousand to seven hundred crowns a year, and for keeping in repair the church buildings (which always are repaired by public subscription), the government compels every national taxpayer to pay a tithe, which is added to his national tax and collected as such; and from paying this tax no one is exempted; hence people belonging to other sects, and Freethinkers, hav likewise to contribute their mite. The sum thus collected exceeded in 1888 the actual church expenses by nearly one hundred thousand crowns, and is officially turned into the public school fund. But actually only a small part of it goes that way; the rest is used by the government to defray "political" expenses—that is, it is used to bribe with.

According to the census returns of 1880 the population of Denmark was 1 969,039 individuals, who were divided according to their faith as follows:

Lutherans	1,951,513	Church of England	125
Hebrews	3 946	Quakers	117
Baptists	3 687	United Brethren	60
Roman Catholics	2 985	Presbyterians	21
Ref'med churches	1 363	Greek Catholics	15
Mormons	1,722	Swedenborgians	10
Irvingians	1,036	Mohammedans	8
Methodists	746	Religion unknown	1,067
Various Christian sects	444	No positiv religion	1,074

The great preponderance of Lutherans I hav accounted for already, and it is the opinion of men who ought to know that were an honest census taken the number would be considerably smaller.

Of course the clergy does not love the exponents of Freethought, and it is no uncommon thing to hear a minister treat his audience to a sermon describing Infidels as monsters, or tell them how "hard" these wicked beings die. But such stories are listened to with half an ear only. The audience, most of which attends for policy's sake only, considers where they come from. There has, however, during the last few years been a clerical reaction, owing to the fact that, thanks to the lying spirit of pulpit and government press, Freethought has been associated with that scarecrow for most Danes, Socialism. Still, no actual religious persecution has taken place since 1849.

There being no organized Freethought party, it follows that there is no purely Liberal periodical publication. Yet every now and then there appear in the larger monthlies excellent articles which display a strong Antichristian feeling. But it is to be regretted that the high price of these magazines, and the fact that the writers always presuppose a very liberal education of their readers, practically keep them outside the pecuniary and intellectual reach of the greater part of the nation, which therefore seldom arrives at that stage of intellectual development where Freethought is the result of personal acquaintance with historical and scientific facts and theological fancies and suppositions. Hence the average Dane never passes the stage of simple skepticism.

And the clergy does whatever is in its power to keep him in ignorance of the actual state of things. It is only ten years ago that the university, which has the sole right of publishing almanacs, left out "year since the creation of the world;" as soon as this omission was noted the edition was suppressed and the faculty received a severe reprimand for the "audacity" it had displayed. Since then the year has been in.

Knowing that lessons taught in childhood are not easily forgotten, the school law provides for religious teachings in all public schools and in the lower classes of academies. In the public schools the day's work is opened with singing a hymn or two; then other songs, mostly of patriotic character. And besides the hymn-singing, four hours are set apart every week for religious instruction. The pupil is in these taught Bible history, catechism, and hymns. In academies the same subjects are taught, but no hymn-singing is indulged in, and the hours of religious study vary according to the principal's taste, but must be at least one hour.

School attendance being strictly enforced, and the years of school age from five to fourteen, it follows that the children of the poorer classes of society imbibe superstition for seven successiv years, while those who attend private schools seldom receive more than three or four years. If the parents do not wish their children to attend religious studies, their wish is complied with, if they can giv satisfactory proof that the children at home will receive "sufficiently" moral and religious instruction. It is to be regretted that but few parents take advantage of this law; but perhaps it is due to the fact that Infidels are not looked favorably upon.

When a child reaches the age of fourteen years, it can be confirmed, and this final ceremony of superstition, while not demanded by law, is yet considered socially a necessity, the confirmation attestation being a card of introduction to the world of business.

As is to be expected, there exists a great deal of ancient and medieval superstition, among the agricultural part of the population especially. Belief in the existence of ghosts, fairies, nisser, in the healing qualities of dead men's bones, blood of an executed criminal, etc., is prevalent, but owing to the excellent common-school education (natural philosophy is taught) it will soon be a thing of the past.

Church attendance at Copenhagen is very slim. Only few men go, and it is only on great holy days, or when a minister is known to be an excellent speaker, of liberal cast, that a church is filled. In the rural communities the matter is worse, and many churches are virtually falling into ruins. It is in the small cities only that church-going is practiced, and hence it is in such places that the clergy are considered "somebody" by almost everybody. At the capital they pose as "ladies' men" if they are good-looking, but as a rule they do not belong to any certain class of society. "Why, only a minister?"

Denmark being a "Christian" country, it has of course its Sunday laws. But they are very harmless. In the cities outdoor work is prohibited, and all stores are closed from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M., but the back-doors are all open and you can make all the noise you please while erecting a new building—if you keep inside; drive a nail outside the building and you will be fined ten crowns for Sabbath breaking. Curious law! After 4 o'clock every place of amusement is open, except the national museums, that are open between the hours of 9 and 4. All theaters are going in the evening. In every dance-house the merry Dane can swing his best girl, and the railroads and excursion boats are running all day long.

The Danish Freethinkers can be divided into two classes. The one, the moderate class, whose representativ is Mr. E. L. Larsen, B. Th., librarian at the Great Royal Library, do not wish religion abolished but wish it subjected to a revision, which would create a philosophy, that allows ample space for religious feelings. This class, however, is not very large.

The members of the other, the radical class, to which most of the scientific and educated belong, are either Agnostics, following Herbert Spencer's philosophy, or pure Atheists. It is to the last sub-division that the most eminent of Danish Freethinkers, Mr. George Brandes, Dr. Ph., LL.D., belongs.

Dr. Brandes, who, through his numerous writings, which hav been translated into all European languages, has achieved a world-wide reputation, was born at Copenhagen Feb. 4 1842. He studied at the university of his nativ city (1859–64), and applied himself first to the study of law, later to philosophy and esthetics. He passed his examination with highest honors, having already (1862) received the university's great gold medal for an essay on "Fatalism among the Ancients." The years 1865–72 he passed in Sweden, Germany, and France. Returning from his travels, he became private tutor at the university, but the opposition against him of the government and clergy, brought about chiefly by his work, published in 1868, "The Dualism of the Philosophy of the Present Time," and his lectures on "Great Literary Currents of the Nineteenth Century," made him leave Denmark and seek a home in Berlin, where at the university of that city he filled the chair of esthetics. In the year 1882 he returned to Copenhagen, his fellow-countrymen having guaranteed him four thousand crowns for a term of ten years, with the single stipulation that he should deliver public lectures on literature at Copenhagen. And it is chiefly due to him and Mr. E. L. Larsen that our friend Viktor E. Lennstrand was enabled two years ago to deliver a lecture to a crowded house in the second largest theater at Copenhagen, and during the late imprisonment of Lennstrand he used his powerful influence among the educated classes in his favor.

A Religious Wail.

Secretary Foster, of the National Reform Association, complains: "In 1863 Congress resolved to request President Lincoln to proclaim a fast that the nation might seek the favor of God 'through the merits of Jesus Christ.' But no Congress before or since officially recognized Christ. In thirty-seven out of forty-two state constitutions God is recognized—Kentucky, Michigan, Oregon, Louisiana, and West Virginia are silent—but no state constitution recognizes Christ. No political party ever recognized Christ in their national platform. Not one of the Thanksgiving proclamations of our presidents contains 'the name that is above every name.' The executiv committee of the National Reform Association wrote a letter to President Harrison last October asking him to recognize Christ in his forthcoming Thanksgiving proclamation. Although he is an elder in the Presbyterian church and for years a teacher in the Sabbath-school, the letter was not answered and his proclamation did not contain the name of the reigning mediator. If Christ be the king in this land, where is his honor? The governors of our states hav generally followed the example of our presidents in omitting the name of Christ from their Thanksgiving proclamations. The people hav thus been educated away from the Bible doctrin that Christ reigns as king. 'The Pharaoh in Egypt knew not Joseph.' The people here are the Pharaoh. They know not our New Testament Joseph. The National Reform Association is the Moses sent to announce the fact that Christ reigns and the people must bow to him. The conflict may be bitter as that of Egypt. But Christ must be owned as king. We must bow to him or perish by his hand."

Assembly of Progress.—L. S. P. (Liberty, Science, and Progress).

The Assembly of Progress has been founded to supply a long-existing vacancy in society. Among all civilized, intelligent aggregations of people, harmonious society is most important to the welfare and happiness of communities, and, in order to realize the greatest degree of happiness in society, it is most important that people of similar views on the leading vital questions of the age should, as much as possible, be united together in social, moral compacts for their own mutual advancement and prosperity. It is clear you cannot unite Catholics and Protestants in the same society with that degree of social concord which should characterize society formed for the mutual benefit and advancement of its members, and the same rule applies to the Methodists and Presbyterians, and to other societies holding adverse religious opinions; and particularly is this true with Freethinkers and believers in orthodox religions. The Christian's feelings are wounded whenever the truth of his faith is questioned, while the Freethinker will not accept the orthodox faith without proof, nor believe the "stories that are told of the miracles of old," and this breeds dissension and discord; alas! too often engenders an animosity which creates permanent enemies who might otherwise hav lived as friends. Therefore the segregation of these opposing elements is necessary to the general welfare of society.

The Catholic church by its thorough organization is a great power and wields a wonderful influence on society and the body politic; and so it is with the Protestant church. It is organized throughout the civilized world, and in consequence of its thorough organization it is strong, and its power is felt as well in politics as in society. There are also organized a large number of social and benevolent secret societies, which, as a general rule, are prosperous and increasing in numbers. But the Liberals, who represent a large part of the intelligent portion of mankind, hav practically no organization, and are therefore unable to exert that influence upon society which is their right by reason of their numbers and intellectual position. Without organization we are without unity of action; without organization our power is unknown; without organization we hav little knowledge of our numbers, and are almost helpless to advance our cause for truth and freedom.

There having been no general beneficiary organization of the Freethinkers, there are now many Liberals who are members of some of the various secret beneficiary orders, notwithstanding the offensiv religious ceremonies in common use in most of the secret orders. The want of society, the importance of co-operativ insurance and sick and funeral benefits so common to benevolent orders, and the absence of a Liberal organization, hav driven them to join these societies however unpleasant the religious ceremonies may be. In consideration of these facts, and to advance the cause of Freethought, the Assembly of Progress has been organized. It provides all the advantages of kindred societies, such as coöperativ insurance, sick and funeral benefits with the least possible expense consistent with a sound financial basis, and presents the opportunities to Liberals to perfect a general and permanent organization, such as will thoroughly organize the Freethinkers throughout the civilized world. With a thorough organization, such as can be brought about through the Assembly of Progress, the Liberals will be in a condition to work, and work successfully, for the cause of liberty and truth. Their numbers will be known, and Liberal literature can be generally circulated through the country. With thorough organization a system of missionary work can be effected among the unfortunate who hav never seen the first glimmering rays of true light.

With the Assembly of Progress organized in every town and city in the country, our Liberal lecturers will receive an audience and a welcome heretofore unknown. The Assembly of Progress is a society free from religious ceremonies and therefore free from religious wrangles, hatreds, and strife—a society wherein Liberal-minded people can assemble together in a pleasant and social manner and peacefully discuss intellectual and scientific subjects without the interference of an assumed deity, or fear of the encroachments of religious creeds or faiths.

J. M. Voss, Grand Prefect.

The Los Angeles Assembly of Progress.

I hav long been intensely anxious that the Liberals should hav a mutual aid society for both sexes that would make sure provision for dependent loved ones, in which no prayers or mummeries, religious or otherwise, would be allowed—a society founded and conducted on strictly business principles, affording insurance at actual cost; paying fair salaries for needed work done, but with no sinecures, fat jobs, or division of spoils among managers.

Because so fully realizing the great need and advantages of such an organization, I am the more anxious that no unreliable or fallacious scheme should be accepted, for it could only result in distrust, and would greatly impede the progress of the genuin.

By long and careful study and consultation with the best actuaries of the United States, I find that the actual cost of $2 000 insurance on lives selected with ordinary care and precaution, between the ages of twenty-one to thirty-five, is $11 per year; from thirty-five to forty-five, is $17; from forty-five to sixty, is $30.

This is not on the "pass your hat" system, but combines the mutual coöperativ assessment and the old line systems, affording all the security of the old line, with all the advantages of the coöperativ.

Each policy is issued for $2,222—the $222 at the death of the member to be paid into the reserve fund of the society, and the $2,000 to the heirs of the deceased.

The death-rate average would be ten to every thousand members each year. Every death secures $222 to the reserve fund, thus accumulating a reserve fund proportionate with the increase of membership, affording security and guarantee of permanency of the society. The Assembly of Progress asks fifty cents a month dues. This is excessiv, and shows either a lack of consideration or too much consideration for the officers and managers. What! fifty cents a month too much for each member to pay to meet expenses of doing all the business of the society? How many members do you expect to obtain? Oh, the first year at least seven hundred. We do not propose to issue benefit policies until after we get that number. No fear but we shall reach over one thousand members the first year, say two thousand the second year, we shall hav ten thousand in a very few years! Seven hundred members at $6 per year, $4,200 for doing business the first year. But there is also a $5 membership fee from males and a $3 one from all female members—not less than $3 000 more—over $7,000, with the hope of its reaching $10 000, for doing the business of the society the first year; $20,000 for the second year, and making $100,000 a year for doing the business if ever the membership reaches ten thousand.

Better go slow before joining such a progressiv assembly. Such "progress" benefits only the promoters of the scheme. Five dollars a week sick benefits to all, rich or poor, is a delusion to the worthy poor, and an incentiv to fraud for the unprincipled, and will prove utterly impracticable in a society extending over the whole United States. The only safe sick benefit is to supply needy members with amounts sufficient to secure nursing, medical attendance, etc., and necessaries for dependent loved ones. This can best be done by loans from the reserve fund of the society, secured by pledge of the sick member's and two other members' policies.

I do not doubt the honesty and good intent of the Los Angeles Assembly of Progress, but their scheme is not practical or relisble. I hope, however, that it will result in great good, by arousing attention, discussion, and intelligent action on this subject that will eventually giv us a safe, reliable, practical Liberal mutual aid society. C. B. Reynolds.

Dr. Severance Heard From.

Although still unable to attend professional duties from the effects of my injuries, I cannot refrain from expressing my opinion of the infamous outrages against citizens' rights in the persons of Moses Harman and E. H. Heywood, unjustly convicted under the most arbitrary and vindictiv ruling of the judges, who, like Judge Gary in the Anarchists' trial, rendered the verdict in advance of the jury. The names of Carpenter, Foster, and Gary should be held in just remembrance as most cruel and tyrannical, trampling the rights guaranteed by the constitution to the individual under their feet in their mad fury, with the delusiv hope of crushing out ideas from which they dissent.

Poor fools! hav they never read history and learned from it that ideas cannot be hanged, or thoughts confined in dungeons? Some of the critics of the methods of Harman and Heywood, while professing a comprehension of the meaning of liberty and indorsing the principle that "the liberty of the individual is only limited by the equal liberty of every other one," in the next breath, like Mr. Savage, assume to know what should or should not be said or written. A liberty which meant the right of another to speak or write what I indorse is no liberty at all. Any tyrant in the world will grant a man that privilege, himself being the censor.

I was proud of Mr. Savage's position in the Heywood letter, but felt disappointed to read the one in The Truth Seeker in which he stultifies his previous noble position. Must I, forsooth, know what opinions a man expresses or how he expresses them, in order to maintain his right to do so? Not at all. He has a right to express his thought, whatever it may be, and in a manner to suit himself; else he has not the right of free speech.

If he wrongs any individual by so doing the person wronged has the right of complaint. Where is the person who claims that Harman or Heywood has wronged him?

But we are told by Mr. Savage and others "we must not load down liberty with needless burdens." Who is to judge what is needless unless it be the persons writing or speaking? Who is to act as censor—Savage or Comstock? This is always the cry of time-serving policy.

I remember when some of the great men in the old Liberal League thought a demand for the repeal of these odious laws enacted for the sole purpose of persecuting Liberal publishers and crushing their papers, was "loading down Liberalism." They, after a severe and long contest, succeeded in unloading, and we are now reaping the result.

There is no such thing in reality as blasphemy or obscenity. To a bigoted Christian Liberal ideas are blasphemous though they be most sacred truths. To a sensualist or a Miss Nancy, if you talk of sex matters as you would discuss any other natural organic function, they pronounce it obscenity.

Both of these constructiv crimes are figments of diseased brains inherited from an ignorant ancestry. When normal brain power dominates, all low thoughts connected with sex matters will cease, and the very word obscenity will become obsolete, just as will the word blasphemy when the right of free speech is recognized by all.

But mark this: The great effort now being made to stop the discussion of marital iniquities is the church's shrewdest method to maintain her power over the people. Once let the idea obtain that property ownership in woman is a crime, that our marriage system is one of enslavement of woman, and once let a generation be born of free mothers, free from sex dominations as well as in every other respect—and how would the church be found? Her power gone, her pews empty. And she knows it, and is fighting against it with all her power, and many Liberals, in their ignorance, are helping her. Such free born citizens would not brook church domination or state denial of natural rights; hence the desperate effort to stop the discussion of this great, this underlying principle upon which all reforms are based, the question of sex freedom and self-ownership. When I see people criticising methods in this great fight for liberty, instead of holding up the hands of those brave enough to dare the world's frowns and jeers in the hope of helping the human race to a better condition, I sometimes feel they are not worth the effort, and that they deserve all the stripes they are receiving from church and state. But brave souls, inspired with noble thoughts, will speak them, and speak in their own way. And if the world is not yet far enough advanced to defend them in their rights so to do, then must they suffer as in the past. But as Fenelon said to Louis XIV., "Woe to him who comprehendeth the truth and speaketh it not. And woe unto you if you are not worthy of learning." Juliet H. Severance, M.D.

Items of Foreign Christian News.

Following the example set by their English-speaking brethren, the German-Evangelical-Lutheran church at their late convention held at Eisenach, Saxony, resolved to revise their creed and to undertake a new translation of the German (Luther's) Bible. Revisions seem to hav come into fashion among our Christian friends.

How the Christians convert the dusky African can be imagined when it is known that during one week there was at Madeira, where most, but far from all ships going to Africa touch, declared the following amount of liquors, representing $5,230,000:

36 000 barrels of rum.	28,000 cases of Irish whisky.
24 000 butts of rum.	30 000 cases of Old Tom.
800,000 demijohns of rum.	15,000 cases of absinth.
960 000 cases of gin.	40,000 cases of vermouth.
30,000 cases of brandy.

No wonder such individuals as the king of Uganda are to be baptized. We suppose the pope, who is to be his godfather, has promised his "child" several demijohns.

Even the German universities are infested with the spirit of bigotry. It appears that the president of the now prohibited Freethought society, Humboldt (Leipzig), has been ejected from the university in said city. The expulsion of Mr. Walther May is to last as long as he identifies himself with the Leipzig Freethinkers. What next?

An Appeal to the Liberal Lecturer.

Dear Fellow-Worker: The American Secular Union and yourself are both working for the same cause—(1) the right to the expression of independent thought unhampered by ecclesiastical tyranny; (2) the total separation of church and state. Each of these things is but a different expression of the same right, and the success of the one means the success of the other. The American Secular Union is, however, devoting its energies especially to the second of these things—total separation of church and state. Realizing, as it does, that law is the crystallized expression of the people's will, whether honestly or fraudulently obtained, and that the God-in-the-Constitution party, backed by local legislation, are to-day powerful enough to infuse into the law of the land their own sectarian and tyrannous ideas, the American Secular Union would urge upon your consideration the need for solid organization among Liberals, and would ask you, as a public worker, to help the national society. We ought to be united into one undivided army. It should be as much of a discredit for Liberals to stand aloof in cliques and not help fight under the standard of the national organization, as it would be among our opponents to set up an isolated church which should forswear allegiance to the sect to which it professes to belong. The ecclesiastical party gain on Liberals because church people pull together, while Liberals hav been hitherto but a rope of sand wherever public coöperation has been concerned.

As you are striving to bring about the same thing as we, will you not work with us and for us? Will you not speak a good word for the national organization to your audiences? Will you not do what you can to induce Liberals to enrol themselvs in the national army of the American Secular Union, so that we may all make a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together in defense of our freedom from church dictation?

We do not ask you to giv up your independence as a lecturer to do this. We should be glad, indeed, if you could manage to collect money for us. But, if you feel that that would interfere with your own income, we will not ask you to do this. We only ask that you use the American Secular Union as a background for your lectures; that, when you shall hav roused your hearers to a sense of their wrongs under the present unjust union of church and state, and shall hav your hearers wrought up to an eager desire for action, you will point them to the American Secular Union as the national army in which they should enlist, if they would help destroy the evils which you are denouncing.

Why should you not coöperate with us in this work?

Such coöperation, if properly managed, would mean a gain both to the cause and to you individually. Think what a solid organization of the majority of Liberals in the country would mean.

1. It would mean coöperation in our attacks upon the enemy. When a wrong anywhere in the country is to be struck at, it would mean that the whole strength of the organization would go into the blows—instead of the matter being left, as now, to a helpless protest from a few Liberals in the immediate vicinity.

2. It would mean a coöperation which would "carry the war into Africa." The Liberals outnumber the church party ten to one, and it is only the superior organization of the latter which renders them so bold and aggressiv in their onslaughts upon our religious liberties. With equal organization on our side, we could soon cause them to feel our influence for the right.

3. It would mean that each lecturer in the country would hav a regular series of appointments mapped out for him by the central organization, in addition to those which he might make independently, so that he could canvass any given section of the country at the least possible expense to himself and to the local societies before whom he lectures. This would mean more dollars in his pocket at the end of the year, as well as a more systematic advertising of the cause; while, at the same time, it would bring him into contact with more people within a given area. Such a plan, of course, should not encroach upon the right of a lecturer to make his own independent engagements.

The tendency of the time is toward consolidation and coöperation where work of any magnitude is to be undertaken; and if Liberals are to hold their own against their opponents they must be welded into a solid organization. To scatter their forces after the wasteful methods of guerilla warfare is to weaken their effectivness. Organization, and only organization, will to-day enable Liberalism to successfully resist the encroachments of the church upon the state.

The peril to our religious liberties presses fast upon us. Comrade, you who are out in the field, will you not do all in your power to rally your fellow-soldiers under the one standard of the American Secular Union, that we may march forward without hindrance to the victory which should be ours?

Near the Prison Door.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As evidence of the progressing obsession of "the government" prosecution in Boston, here is a copy of the United States district attorney's brotherly note to Lawyer Searle, last week:

BOSTON, July 1, 1890.

BROTHER SEARLE: I find that there will be nothing to interfere with the disposition of the Heywood case on Thursday of this week. I will therefore move, on July 3d, at 11 A.M., for sentence of Heywood. Kindly see that he is here, and report to Mr. Stetson to-night, if this time is agreeable.

Yours sincerely,
(Signed) F. D. ALLEN.

The obsessing spirit "rises" in its tone, and hence the medium, bespeaking authority, is more imperativ this week. Here is a copy of the latest manifesto from the Comstock-Wanamaker outfit:

BOSTON, July 10, 1890.

G. W. SEARLE, ESQ., BOSTON, Dear Sir: Please call at this office the first of the week—say on Monday next—and arrange for imposing sentence upon E. H. Heywood.

Yours respectfully,
(Signed) FRANK D. ALLEN, U. S. Dist. Atty.

So, you see, Comstock's spirit (Comstock himself was dead and damned in the minds of all intelligently honest persons years ago), Comstock's medium, Judge Carpenter, will probably sentence me the 16th or 17th, next Wednesday or Thursday. I mean no disrespect, of course, to the noble word "medium" in the above use of it.

In his own matchless way Colonel Ingersoll shows how much more savage ghosts hav been than real persons. So I expect severer sentence than if the real, human, flesh-and-blood Comstock were to impose it.

Twelve years ago they gave us, in regular course of law and custom, five months and seven days on appeal, and allowed the case to be re-argued before two judges. In Mr. Bennett's case, I think three months and two judges were allowed. Now Carpenter, the most obtuse, unjust, imperious, and unscrupulous judge who has yet sat in these cases, shoves all the motions and exceptions aside, refuses to sit with another judge, drags his victim into a blind alley, and brains, bludgeons him, alone! But: "If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they" (Eccl. v, 8). The hotly serviceable mediums of an obscene spirit, Allen and Carpenter, will find that "there are higher than they" before they get through with this "suppressing" business. Wendell Phillips used to say, "Antislavery truth floats further on the hisses of a mob than on the accents of the most eloquent oratory." Though superstitious savagery now riots in judicial ermin, the sober sense of the people will assert right, now trodden in the mire of debauched authority. Of course, physically, they can dispose of me; but, more alive after "death" than before, citizen right to mental enlightenment, the integrity of the human body and the human mind I stand for, will be irresistibly vindicated, whatever becomes of the flesh and blood of its materially transient exponents. Civilization gains in proportion as mind develops, becomes able to tell bodies what to do and what not to do. That brilliant, heroic, and lifelong exponent of Freethought, Elizur Wright, said: "If there is any unpardonable sin, it is telling a lie to a woman to win her love. We must hav truth in that spot, or this world is a hell."

For truth between adult sexes, for truth between parents and children, Mrs. Heywood and I stand. As you noted, the two indicted articles were written by women—one of them, "The Woman's View of It," resenting Comstock's effort to supervise maternal function by act of Congress, was written by the mother of my four children, the woman with whom I hav had the honor to share a home twenty-five years. It is high time woman's right to an opinion as to the use of her own body by man was respected. You hav your opinions, Mr. Editor, I mine, and you hav well said that you will fight for the right of another to differ from you.

Though rash frenzy now moves those in power to reckless action, there is a day after to-day, and I hav not the least doubt that right in me, now fiercely denied, will ultimately win. Like verbal treason and blasphemy, the obscenity scare will cease to hav power over any decently intelligent mind. Comstock's spirit now runs things. In 1878, Devens; in 1883, Nelson; in 1884 (state case), Pitman; in 1887, Democratic United States District Attorney Geo. M. Stearns—in all the past cases strong men stood between me and the foes of freedom, order, purity, and progress, though now no Republican official has sense and strength to bespeak moderation and stay the hand of violence. Intellectual liberty, for which you and I liv and serve, will not fail, or the cause of popular right anywise go backward. Rather the word is Forward, whoever falls in the glorious struggle.

Ecclesiastical vs. Civil Authority.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just issued and distributed, mainly in single wrappers, and gratuitously, a thousand copies of a discourse of mine, entitled, "Ecclesiastical vs. Civil Authority—God in the Federal Constitution, Man and Woman Out."

It has met with unexpected favor and approval. And certainly all the signs of the times indicate the fearful need of such a word of warning.

I now propose to issue a larger, cheaper edition, with a few important additions, at ten cents per single copy, three copies for a quarter, and fifteen for a dollar; sent by mail on receipt of price.

The discourse treats of three general but most important particulars—the rights and wrongs of woman in state, society, and church, the God-in-the-Constitution conspiracy, and the non-taxation of church and other religious property. And surely three more momentous problems are not now in human agitation, nor thought.

The free list will not be discontinued, nor is it intended that money be made by this enterprise, while it is also hoped that none will be lost by even the purchasers and readers. And it is further earnestly desired by the author of the lecture, that none will buy in greater number than can be well and wisely distributed among readers.

The present prospect is portentous of stupendous, but not desirable, events and results. The religious activities alone are of such character, variety, and power as to render it almost certain that freedom, civil or religious, is not to be had and secured without another appeal to the sword. And both church and pulpit are as ready to die as to kill, or to kill as to die, in defense of their God of battles and blood—the God they hav devoutly worshiped, with human sacrifices sometimes of their enemies, with fagot and fire, for more than fifteen hundred years!

The tract can be had, in any quantity, of the author at Concord, N. H.

Faithfully and fervently yours for the true and right, at whatever cost,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Immortality of Man.

It is a popular belief that there are certain principles and tenets supposed to be essentials which are common to all religions or to the different forms of sectarian faith. Among them is that cardinal one called the immortality of the soul, or the belief in a future life. These essential or primary elements of faith probably all hav a philosophic foundation, a scientific basis.

When the human mind first began to grapple with metaphysical problems, there could be no unity of methods, no equal opportunities among widely scattered theorists and investigators, that could lead to unity of results in their conclusions.

Every period of the world's history accords with our own experience in this, that there hav been some master minds, some deeper thinkers and investigators, who would collect and collate the accumulated knowledge and speculativ notions of those who hav gone before and formulate them into a system of philosophy that could be vindicated and sustained by the facts of experience and by the laws or principles of nature.

These leading minds hav evolved the theories and recorded them, and they hav come down to us through many generations, often receiving additions and amendations or such alterations as the intellectual condition or demands of faith seemed to require. Different nations with different degrees of intelligence would vary the interpretation to adapt it to the capacity of those who were to receive it. It is from this cause that the ideas of immortality are so varied now in different parts of the world.

None of these popular, empirical theories of immortality that sway the minds of the ignorant or unscientific masses can be relied upon as real, since they are all in conflict in some important points, and none of them can be verified or demonstrated to accord with the known facts of nature or with common experience.

They are all crude outgrowths of feeble mental development and a morbid activity of hope, marvelousness, reverence, and ideality. The visions and spectral images, these gross conceptions of a future life engendered by the emotions and hopes, no matter what shape they take, how beautiful, picturesque, or ecstatic, how blissful or enduring, how gorgeous or transcendent they may be painted, are all unreal, and hav no foundation in those true principles, on that genuin scientific basis of a verifiable or demonstrable immortality, discovered and taught by ancient philosophers.

Our vague ideas of the doctrin of the immortality of the spirit hav grown out of the crude, undeveloped minds of those who hav been entrusted to expound and elucidate it. They hav been incapable of understanding a principle, a fact, or a truth, unless it was associated with a personality, a living, activ individual, an incarnation and organic structure through which it could be exhibited, manifested, and exemplified. So that the spirit of a man must take and retain a form as a separate personal entity to exist in the future, otherwise it must become annihilated and extinct. This false anthropological conception of immortality originated with the savage and lingers everywhere in societies whose conditions and opportunities hav not yet so advanced as to enable them to grasp and comprehend the true views as understood and taught by the wisest and greatest teachers of the past.

That the spirit which animates men is immortal is a philosophic truth.

Let that spirit be good or evil, kind or cruel, broad and generous or mean and narrow, selfish or benevolent, wise or vindictiv, it never dies out or experiences annihilation, but is ever activ, being reproduced continually and forever in some human form by the laws of life through a transmission of inheritance and conditions, somewhere in the arena of the human family on this habitable globe.

Every passion and emotion, every attribute, every faculty and acquisition, is immortal. Since the hour the first man appeared on earth the constituents that made him a man hav ever existed; so that his immortality in the past remains unbroken, and his immortality in the future is equally certain.

Even if he were to become extinct as an organized being, the forces that constitute him a man would still exist somewhere dormant in nature, maintaining their immortality.

We will not enumerate or descant on the lessons history teaches us of what the past has suffered from these gross, animal views of immortality—how much these erroneous sentiments hav had to do in engendering religious strife and wars—what hates and revenges hav been cherished and gratified by sects, provinces, and kingdoms against each other for teaching heresy, in holding and inculcating unorthodox doctrins about the nature, conditions, and destiny of the soul or spirit, in a future state of existence!

Whereas the true views exempt all who hold them from the temptation to indulge in the crimes and cruelties that hav always been prompted by the false. Errors of opinion on questions involving eternal consequences hav given rise to the most implacable and malignant animosity and the most embittered and relentless persecutions.

The immortality of matter and of the force or spirit that pervades, animates, and energizes it, were themes that might well employ the minds of the great thinkers and the speculativ genius of the past. As far as our records introduce us to man's earliest life on the globe, these questions hav engrossed the minds of thinkers and the leaders of peoples. They will ever furnish topics for speculation and inquiry. The wise and intelligent will always be interested, entertained, and improved by their discoveries of the harmonies and unities existing everywhere in nature. The mysteries that distract the ignorant are continually receiving solutions through the researches and revelations made by the students who sit as humble pupils at the footstool of nature. The very lessons that purify and perfect the wise seem to poison and pervert the minds of those who do not understand them.

"Eternal life" and "everlasting life" are other forms of expressing the same thought. The ancient philosophers in evolving their theories of immortality made use of these words or their equivalents in elaborating the idea. The postulate of eternal life is but the simple statement of what is seemingly an eternal truth. These ancient thinkers had no knowledge of when life began, when this "in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" occurred, and as it had continued for unnumbered centuries the next rational inference was that it would ever continue—that the stream of life in this world would be eternal, everlasting. It is the testimony of modern scholarship and of biblical students that this is the only sense in which the ancient more advanced thinkers meant to use it and hav it understood.

The peculiarities and forms of life, even to the visage, temperaments, and aptitudes, are transmitted and reproduced for many generations, so that almost the personal identity of ancestors is exhibited in descendants so distinctly as to suggest the idea and the faith not only in a spiritual but of a physical immortality—of a resurrection of the buried parent in the person of his offspring.

Discussion of these subjects among the old biologists might be very philosophical and interesting to them, but when they passed from the schools to the heathen, or to the ignorant, uncultured men of the heath, as individuals in isolation, or even in nomadic tribes, they were not understood in any scientific sense, but took the form of ghosts or sprites, retaining their personalities and inhabiting an invisible world somewhere in space, to be revealed after death. In this way the science, the philosophy and facts, of the few who were engaged in efforts for the solution of the great mysteries and problems of nature were converted by the credulous and unreasoning masses into a system of startling and awe-inspiring superstition. This opened the way and created a demand for priests or teachers to entertain and instruct the multitude in reference to their conduct here, and its connection with their fate when they pass from this earth after death to an upper or a nether world, to enjoy or suffer in person that immortality or eternal life which their superstitious guides and teachers had in their low, sensuous conceptions formed out of the entire misunderstanding of the lessons evolved from the discoveries and conclusions of sages and philosophers.

The question now presents itself seriously to the minds of the enlightened people of this era, which of these theories commends itself as the most probable and rational to our judgment, our understanding and reason? Which does the lesson of all nature most confirm and approve? Shall we take the wisdom that evolved the most rational thought, or the ignorance and superstition that invented the most irrational and impossible? Shall we follow the multitude because they are the more ignorant, less thoughtful and more credulous, yet popular majority, who hav gained an ascendency by decrying and resisting science and reason as the guides of life, and terrifying the weak and unthinking by appeals to their marvelousness, their reverence, and their faith? If the majority are thus led, shall the minority surrender their scientific convictions, yield their assent, and follow them?

If we take for granted that the theories of the credulous multitude are correct and that man does exist as a conscious personality in an invisible ethereal world, endowed with the attributes of a sensuous, organized being, it is impossible for us to conceive how that existence is sustained or what are the conditions and relations of being with any conceivable environment. We know of no form of organized life that is not subject to certain structural laws involving a constant waste and process of nutrition, to replenish the consumption of material ever accompanying the vital action of living beings. To think of an individual life without decay and death conflicts with all we know and is a proposition that defies the powers of the intellect to entertain. To accept it is to discredit all we hav ever learned, and to relinquish our faith in the stability or reality of the demonstrated facts of nature. We must entertain the theory, if it is in any sense admissible, as an undemonstrated, unverifiable assumption or dogma and never as a working hypothesis. If what we call reason is really a human faculty, we can hav no use for it in that visionary, prospectiv eternity of the dogmatist. It is an endowment evolved from our material environment that we may preserve ourselvs from destruction by the hostil elements and keep in touch with the factors and forces that sustain organic life.

But in an immortal existence there can be no wear, no waste nor decay, no end, no use for thought, for reason, for mental or moral effort. It is simply to exist without a purpose or a capability, without motiv or emotion.

To be obliged to exist in this torpid, moribund, inactiv, purposeless state, and that eternally, is a conception revolting to a conscious being, abhorrent to reason and humanity.

Why or for what purpose was such a provision instituted? In the material world of life things exist from necessity. The latent forces inherit in matter, ever activ and evolving, and by an irresistible propulsion are projecting to the surface of the planet all that vivifies and beautifies it. This is the cause and condition of life. To liv forever without any of the conditions, would be a gratuitous burden, a cruelty unworthy of human thought, much less a design of any infinit wisdom, to whom or which we giv the credit in this nether world, of exhibiting to our senses causes and effects, law and order, life and adaptation, and a field for intellectual exertion, and that exertion which constitutes the zest of being. To liv forever for no purpose, in eternal uselessness, hibernating, can hav no attractions, and would be a fate one would suppose every living being would be happy to escape.

If we admit the dogmas of this theologic immortality in any of their variety, and we hold the believers to any consistency of faith in it as a universal principle of nature or providence, it must take in all the human family on this planet at least, and for all time. If there are living on the earth a population of fifteen thousand millions, and we estimate the average human life the world over at thirty years, then every thirty years this vast population is swept from this mortal into the immortal life, and we assume this change has been in operation for only one thousand centuries, the number thus translated exceeds anything the human mind can conceive. Do they require space? Where can it be found? If they exist for any purpose, what is it? Our modern Spiritualists tell us there is all about us an atmosphere, a sea, of these guardian angels in which we breathe and move, and the evidence they offer of the fact is that they claim to hav communication with some few score, perhaps, of them. But these reputed visitants giv us no satisfaction in regard to the occupations of the numberless millions who fail to report themselvs.

Yes, here is a problem that apparently defies the genius and intellect of mortals and immortals to solve. We must infer that nearly all of those who entered eternity one hundred thousand years ago, and the untold legions of recruits that hav joined them since, are hibernating somewhere, awaiting the resurrection for some unknown purpose.

The army of wiseacres enlisted in this school of a theological, personal immortality, though positiv and brave in its defense, hav many humiliating and insuperable difficulties to encounter.

While claiming to know that spirits do exist and communicate with them, and giv such satisfactory tests of their presence, yet they impart little that can be relied on as historical, scientific, or descriptiv of the ethereal world and its denizens. The spirits seem chary in revealing its mysteries and purposes, and their messages are meager even to the elect; and they apparently take no interest in common folk. When an honest, earnest man in pursuit of more knowledge goes "In Search of a Spirit," they elude him, exciting a suspicion of something wrong and that there is a trick in the trade they intend to conceal. It looks like a conspiracy between them and their earthly allies to keep all in the background possible, to save any risk of exposure of secrets to critics or curious inquirers, that are reserved for the benefit only of the credulous.

This is a happy arrangement, and has long been known and practiced by theologians successfully to win believers.

They hav found there must be great latitude and liberty taken and many excuses granted them, in discussing the things of the invisible world. The spirit world is made for believers only. Infidels, doubters, and critics hav no claims there.

They need not hope on leaving the earth to fare any better than they hav here.

If they are permitted to occupy some obscure corner and there remain to atone for their presumption, they must accept it as an act of mercy that they were even worthy of being recognized as spirits.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL will spend the summer in Oregon and Washington lecturing. His address is 100 South First street, Portland, Ore.

W. F. JAMIESON delivered the Fourth of July oration in Hampton, Ia., to several thousand people. Sunday evening, July 13th, he was to lecture in New Hartford, Ia.; is engaged to giv three lectures in Colesburg, Ia.; will then visit Minnesota to lecture and debate; is engaged to deliver a course of lectures in Milbank, Dak., and there is talk there of a Catholic priest meeting him in debate. His first lectures in Minnesota will be given in Byron, Kasson, and Plainview. Liberals in that state wishing courses of lectures should address him at Des Moines, Ia., as his lecture engagements are several weeks in advance.

Religion in School.

From the New York World.

Archbishop Ireland, in his address before the National Educational Association at St. Paul on Thursday, declared that though he is a Catholic prelate he would rather hav Protestantism taught in the public schools than to hav no religion taught there.

The utterance indicates a very Liberal mind, but it is founded, as too much of the discussion of this subject is, upon a total misapprehension of the question. It is not a question of Protestantism or Catholicism. It is not in this country even a question whether or not the children would be the better for religious instruction. It is simply a question of the functions of the state and the rights of men.

Ours is a purely secular state, in which men of all religions and men of no religion are upon an exactly equal footing before the law. It has nothing whatever to do with creeds or with religion, except to protect all citizens alike in their perfect religious liberty. The public schools are maintained by the secular state for the secular education of the children; their religious education is a matter with which the state has no business to concern itself. That is a matter for parents and pastors.

The state has no more right to teach a religion which is held by the great majority of the people than to teach one held by only one of all its citizens. It has no right to interfere with religion at all.

IF you had asked the whole earth, before the time of Copernicus, Has the sun risen? has it set to-day? all men would hav answered, we are quite certain of it. They were certain, and they were in error. Witchcraft, divinations, and possessions were for a long time the most certain things in the world in the eyes of society. What an innumerable crowd of people who hav seen all these fine things and who hav been certain of them! At present this certainty is a little shaken.—Voltaire.

The Elephant-Under-the-Earth.

Prof. Pavion Spence in a Chicago Paper.

The child asks the father what supports the earth. To avoid an explanation which is beyond the child's comprehension, the father tells him that it rests upon a great elephant's back. The child, who is intelligent enough to think that the earth needs a support, at once wonders what supports the elephant, and if told that it stands upon a terrapin's back he again asks what supports the terrapin, and his mind thus follows the trail ad infinitum, never finding any final support that does not itself need to be supported as much as the very earth with which he began his questions. So, even he, child as he is, comes to the conclusion that his father's explanation is all fudge.

The foregoing is a very plain case of false philosophy; so plain, indeed, that everyone at once rejects it as insufficient and inadequate. We hav introduced it here because its very simplicity and plainness will enable us, by comparison, to see the fallacy of many scientific theories and philosophical explanations, some of which are now, and hav been in all ages, accepted by learned and wise men without murmur, although they are of precisely the same character as the theory of the elephant-under-the-earth, and are just as absurd and ridiculous. Our books, ancient and modern, are full of such foolish inventions of men of science and philosophers; they are taught in our schools, colleges, and universities; they are preached from our pulpits, and they pervade the popular mind, cropping out in the columns of our magazines and our weekly and daily papers, and in the conversation of the learned and the unlearned, as matters that are fixed and settled and not to be questioned for a moment—and woe be to him who does question some of them.

Before we proceed in the application of our illustration to other theories, so as to make their absurdity appear as plain as that of the illustration itself, let us look more closely at the elephant supporting the earth, and see what that supposition involves. In other words, let us see what an elephant-under-the-earth really is, so that we may ever after know him at first sight, no matter how disguised or by whom introduced.

In the theory of the elephant-under-the-earth, we find the following elements which are essential, characteristic, specific:

1. It is supposed that the earth cannot support itself.

2. The elephant-under-the-earth is also a supposition, a pure invention, made to supply a supposed need.

3. The sole business of the elephant-under-the-earth is to do that one thing—to support the earth—and there it must stand forever, merely supporting the earth, with no other office or function. In other words, one thing is supposed to hav been created, or to hav happened into being, merely to wait upon another—to do the work of another, work which that other can just as well be supposed to do for itself.

4. If the earth is inadequate to do its own work, the elephant-under-the-earth is equally inadequate, and so needs a terrapin under it; and the terrapin, for the same reason, needs something under it, and so on ad infinitum.

5. Then, to meet all the requirements of the case, we must do violence to our own reason, and suppose the elephant-under-the-earth to be not only big enough and strong enough, but in every respect fully adequate and adjustable to the work. Of course, when a need is to be met by a supposition, it is easy enough to suppose a supposition that is fully adequate and adjustable to all the requirements of the case, no matter how unintelligible it may be. There is no use in mincing matters. Suppositions are cheap—they cost nothing.

6. The elephant-under-the-earth is totally unnecessary; for it is just as easy (and it is more economical of elements or principles) to suppose that the earth can support itself, as it is to suppose that the elephant can support itself.

The foregoing being characteristics of the elephant-under-the-earth (I mean of the species), then in looking for the elephants-under-the-earth (individuals of the species) we must not look for immense four-footed beasts with leathery hides, short, tufted tails, ivory tusks, and great muscular trunks; for none of these enter into the constitution of the species. On the other hand, all things that contain the foregoing specific characteristics, no matter whether they be things visible or invisible, tangible or intangible, shaped or shapeless; no matter for how many centuries or millenniums they may hav been cherished as the very energy of the world, the very soul of man, or the very God of the universe; and no matter how completely they hav been fused and welded as something real, rational, and ever-abiding into our mental machinery, and into our language, and into the very forms and habits of our thinking, are, nevertheless, all equally fictitious, equally unphilosophical, and equally absurd and ridiculous. Sooner or later science will disown them and philosophy must ultimately reject them all. Take, for instance, the following examples:

Bodies are known to vary in temperature, being now hot, now warm, now cold. To account for this varying temperature, it was at one time supposed that there exists in nature an imponderable element distinct from matter, to which the name caloric was given; and that if a body takes into itself some of this caloric it becomes warmer than it was; and on parting with caloric it becomes colder than it was. Caloric has, long since, shared the fate of the elephant under-the-earth. It has given way to the modern theory that water warms itself by the rapid vibratory motion of its molecular constituents. And, if we test the caloric theory by the six characteristics already enumerated, we shall see that it is merely an elephant-under-the-earth, and was justly abandoned, even if there had been no such reasons as we now hav for believing that matter warms and heats itself.

Again, it is supposed that mere matter is dead; yet we see living things all around us. How is that? The prodigal inventor of ultimate elements comes forward with his vital principle, and supposes that it, under certain circumstances, gets into matter and makes it alive. The theory of a vital principle is pretty well abandoned in recent times, though there are still a few able and learned men who cling with tenacity to that ridiculous and unnecessary hypothesis. If the reader will take the trouble to analyze it, he will find that it contains all the specific characteristics of the elephant-under-the-earth, and as such should be surrendered.

To the same class belongs the theory of an electric fluid, considered as an element distinct from matter. The theory will not cover all the facts, and is now regarded either as obsolete or not proved; and although the term, electric fluid, is still used in standard treatises on electricity and magnetism, and the passage of electricity along a conductor is spoken of as a flow of something, yet such an expression is not intended to convey the idea that there is an actual flow of an element which is distinct from the matter that constitutes the conductor, but is simply used as an illustration, a comparison, which will enable us to conceive the movements, methods, and formulated laws of electricity and magnetism, for which, as yet, there is no satisfactory theory that will serve us any better, or as well. The same may be said of human or animal magnetism, when spoken of as an element distinct from matter. It is an unphilosophical hypothesis.

Again, it is said that matter can neither feel nor think. Yet we know that animals and human beings do think and feel. Philosophers were here in a quandary again; but only for a little while; for nothing is easier than to imagin an immaterial element whose special business is to think and feel; and there is nothing easier than to suppose that it, somehow, gets into the bodies of men and animals, and does their thinking and feeling for them. But this theory of an immaterial element, a thinking principle, a mind, considered as something different from the element called matter, is evidently an elephant-under-the-earth, having all its specific characteristics, as follows:

1. It is supposed that matter cannot think or feel.

2. The immaterial element, the mind, as something distinct from matter, is a pure invention, made to supply a supposed need.

3. The sole business of that immaterial element is to do that thing, to think and feel for matter—to wait upon another element called matter—to do its work, work which matter can just as well be supposed to do for itself. If it be said that no one ever perceived matter in the act of thinking or feeling, that it is necessarily non-sentient and unthinking, and that it is impossible for us to understand how it can think or feel, it can be said, with equal truth, that no one ever perceived an immaterial element in the act of thinking or feeling; that there is nothing in the nature of such an element that necessarily makes it a thinking and feeling element, and that it is impossible for us to understand how it can think or feel. If, therefore, I ask you how your immaterial principle really does think and feel, you can only answer, I make it do so. How? By my supposition. But cannot a supposition do as much for matter?

4. If we are obliged to suppose that one element, matter, can neither think nor feel, we are equally obliged to suppose that the other element can do neither, and, therefore, needs some other element to think and feel for it; and so on, ad infinitum.

5. But suppositions are cheap; and as one seems badly needed here, it is made fully competent and duly adjusted to its work, although in doing so the inventor is compelled to do violence to his own reason by supposing that what is invalid in one case is perfectly valid in another similar case—that while the earth cannot support itself the elephant can.

6. The immaterial principle is totally unnecessary, for it is just as easy (and it is more economical of elements or principles) to suppose that matter can think and feel as it is to suppose that any other element can.

In this discussion it is not necessary that we should make any attempt to find out what matter really is; nor is it necessary that we should know what it is. What we are now aiming at is simply to show that, in interpreting that phenomenon of nature, it is unnecessary and unphilosophical to multiply principles or ultimates; and that even two (matter and mind) are as bad as a dozen, because one will answer all the purposes required. In the case of matter and mind, it is immaterial which one is supposed to take precedence over the other in their joint action. Turn them up side down or right side up, and, in either case, one is elephant to the other, and is therefore unnecessary.

I hav no doubt, however, that the ultimate analysis of what is called matter, will show that it consists of the same element as what is called mind; and that, therefore, the ultimate constituent of the universe of matter and mind is not two but one element, call it force, spirit, matter, mind, consciousness, or whatever you please. In my "New Theory of Consciousness" (See Journal of Speculativ Philosophy, July, 1880), by a process of speculativ reasoning I found myself driven to the conclusion that the atom of matter is an ultimate of consciousness, after having, in the same article, identified force with consciousness and hence also with matter. And as I now look at it, it would not be a difficult undertaking to prove the same thing about matter, not by speculativ reasoning merely, but by an appeal to facts which are in the possession of everyone.

One more example and I am done. We look out upon the vast and wonderful visible and tangible phenomena of the universe of matter—its boundless sea of stars, some of which seem held by invisible hands in the same relativ positions for ages, while others revolve in such well-defined, mathematical curves and times around our sun, that their exact places in the heavens can be predicted with certainty; its crystallizations in mathematical forms around mathematically determined axes; its chemical relations of atoms that can be definitly expressed in numerical formulas; its curious microscopic vegetable and animal germs which, though containing nothing that bears the slightest resemblance to either an animal or a vegetable, yet, when placed under suitable conditions, are steadily urged forward through a regular series of changes in their outward form and their internal structure until, in one case, a lily, a fern, or an oak, perhaps, is the final outcome, and, in the other, a fly, an elephant, or a man, mind and all, is the ultimate result. Now, it is said, how can unaided matter do all these things and the ten thousands of others which are equally as wonderful but which are all beyond its capacity? We must look to some other element to do them, some other principle that shall take matter as the potter takes the clay and mold it into all the various forms which we see around us, at the same time imparting to them motion, heat, chemical affinity, life, and mind. We must, in imagination, make that principle vast enough, strong enough, skillful enough, thoughtful enough, wise enough, and in every way competent to do all those things. We will call it God, Lord, Jehovah, almighty. Nevertheless, call it by all the exalted names you please, and endow it with all the ineffable attributes in the vocabulary of human language, and mystify and hide it behind the thick and impenetrable veil of all the deaf, dumb, blind, and impotent infinitudes that the human mind can conjure up, you can never succeed in disguising it beyond recognition. It still has all the specific characteristics of the elephant-under-the-earth, and should be, and ultimately will be, rejected by all thoughtful men.

The watchword of science is genesis. The watchword of philosophy is causality. Genesis and causality are substantially one and the same thing; the different names being simply expressiv of different ways of looking at the universe. Science looks from below, through the procedure or genesis of one thing from another, up to the final ultimate or element from which they hav all proceeded; while philosophy looks down from that ultimate, through its causal relations, and thus embraces all things and their genetic procedures. Hence, philosophy must begin with monism, or a theory of one final ultimate or element; and science must, in the end, demonstrate the truth of monism; for, in a universe of two or more ultimates, there could be neither a universal causality nor a universal genesis. Different ultimates and their procedures could hav no genesis from each other; for by that very genesis, they would cease to be different ultimates, and the one from which they all proceeded would be the one final ultimate. Nor could different ultimates be causally and efficiently related to each other. Therefore, on a cosmical theory of two or more ultimates, there being neither genetic nor causal and efficient relations between them, each ultimate and its procedures would constitute a universe by itself; and we would thus hav, instead of one universe, as many universes as there are ultimates, all independent of, and forever isolated from, each other. Hence the endless trouble and perplexities which philosophers in all ages hav had in their efforts to explain our universe on the supposition that it is composed of two ultimate constituents, matter and mind. The gulf between them has never been bridged, and never can be. o difficulty sprang that curiosity of philosophical literature, Leibnitz's explanation of the relation between matter and mind. Admitting, as he did, that matter and mind are different ultimates, he was obliged to admit that the one could not act upon the other Hence he contended that there is no real causal and efficient relation between them, but only a seeming relation, which he explained by his theory of "Pre-established Harmony," substantially as follows: I make two clocks so exactly alike in their works that they shall always keep pace with each other, the hands of both always pointing to the same hour and minute. The one being perfectly independent of and isolated from the other, neither one causes the other to register the same time as itself; but they register the same time because I prëestablished such a harmony between them. In the same way, as Leibnitz supposed, God made a universe of matter and also a universe of minds, perfectly independent of, and isolated from, each other; yet he established such a harmony in their movements that where one shows up a certain phenomenon, the other shows up its corresponding phenomenon. Thus, I will my arm to move. My will does not move the arm, however; because the will and the arm hav no causal and efficient relation to each other; but, nevertheless, my arm moves simultaneously with my will that it shall move, because my body, in the course of its own independent actions, has just reached that point where my arm moves simultaneously with the equally independent action of my mind which just then wills that my arm shall move.

Berkeley attempted to solve the difficulty now under consideration by annihilating the external world, the world of matter, considered as something separate and apart from, and outside of, each individual mind. So ingeniously did he do this, that Hume considers his arguments "unanswerable, although they convince nobody." And, in more recent times, Bain declares that "all the ingenuity of a century and a half, has failed to see a way out of the contradictions exposed by Berkeley." But Berkeley simply evades the difficulty by ignoring a fact which is a persistent part of it, and which, therefore, must be admitted and explained by any adequate cosmical theory. Berkeley, as a monist, admitted but one ultimate, namely, mind; but he denied the real external existence of what is called matter, which everyone knows has a real existence, external to, outside of, and different from, every individual mind and all its sensations or other states of consciousness. We know this by an actual demonstration, as valid as an intuition, as I hav explained in my "Facts about External Perception," published in the Journal of Speculativ Philosophy, October 1885. The question here is, not what those things called matter are made of; for, as we hav already seen, monism is the only philosophical cosmical theory; and, on any monistic theory, matter must be made of the same stuff that mind is made of, call that stuff spirit, force, mind, consciousness, matter, or what not. But the question to each individual now is, whether the things which he perceives around him, and which are called matter, are outside of his own mind and hav a permanent existence outside of his own mind and of all other minds, so that they abide when stripped of those sensations in his own mind which are related to them; —and still endure when he is asleep or unconscious, so that when he awakens or comes to consciousness, he may again perceive those very same outside things. Berkeley answers this question in the negativ, and thus annihilates the external world, ignoring the very first lesson which nature demonstrated to him, as to Hume and to everyone else, so irresistibly, that (as Hume was honest enough to admit) it dominates and controls the skeptic even while he is repudiating it. Berkeley even goes so far as to assert that it is impossible to conceive of an external object, such as a house or a tree, existing independent of and outside of all minds whatsoever. Now, to each individual, external objects are objects which now exist, but are not in his consciousness. Such objects can never be got into his consciousness, and can never be known to him by intuition, but only by demonstration. But according to Berkeley's principles, what are called external objects are, to each individual, objects which seem external although they are really in his consciousness. Such objects do not exist at all when not in his consciousness (for they are simply his sensations, which, of course, are his own and nobody else's; nor can anybody else's be, or become, his), and can never be known to him by demonstration, but only by intuition.

Berkeley's external world is, to each individual, only a seeming, fictitious external world, all of whose constituents are really internal, in consciousness, subjectiv. And the same is true of Kant's external world; it is subjectiv, internal, and is only seemingly, fictitiously external. With both of these philosophers, the conversion of the really internal things into seemingly external things, is brought about by a kind of hocus-pocus—divine hocus-pocus with Berkeley, and the hocus-pocus of categories with Kant—for nothing but actual hocus-pocus (a trick which "no fellow can find out," and which it was never intended that any fellow should find out) can ever convert the internal, the subjectiv, into the external, the objectiv; nor even into a seeming external, unless there be a real perceived external object to aid in the work as a foundation of the whole process. The very idea of externality, or of seeming externality, could never hav been suspected, conceived of, dreamed of, or in any way got into our heads, without a real external object to develop that idea in our minds, not by intuition (for it can never come to us in that way) but by demonstration. But a further discussion of this subject would require that I should enter more fully than would be justifiable here, upon a consideration of external perception, a mental process of which Berkeley had not the faintest idea, and Kant only the most bewildering, lumbering, and confused one.

Before and After.

It is claimed by some that during the second and third century numbers of Christians were subjected to persecution and prosecution by those who differed with them on the subject of religion. And Wm. Paley urges that "there is satisfactory evidence that many, professing to be original witnesses of the Christian miracles, passed their lives in labors, dangers, and sufferings . . . in consequence of their belief in those accounts!" How far these claims are true must be left to the student, who will soon discover that these "original witnesses" are few in number.

During the second and third centuries, the church of Christ, a patchwork of older materials, appears to hav grown in power and influence, and commanded the services of many writers well qualified to champion their faith against those who it is alleged subjected them to "labors, dangers, and sufferings."

Prominent among these champions of the faith are the names of Justin Martyr and Tertullian. Justin Martyr about the year 147 addressed his First Apology to the emperor, senate, and people of Rome. Justin, like other early apologists for Christianity, wrote principally against persecution and pleaded for toleration. He says:

"I ask you, what is the proof of a man's guilt? Is it his name or his actions? A man is accused of being a Christian; he denies that he is one; you immediately set him at liberty, you hav no fault to find with him. Another, on being accused, makes an open and honest declaration of his faith: you immediately condemn him. In fact, we are only proscribed for our name. Is it not rather the actions and life of these men that ought to be inquired into?"

The Apology of Tertullian was written two or three years before the year 200. He demonstrates the injustice of persecution for religion's sake, and pleads with considerable force for religious toleration. In his address to the proconsul Scapula he pleads for real freedom. "It ought," he says, "to be left to the free choice of men to embrace that religion which seems to them most agreeable to truth. No one is injured or benefited by another man's religion; it is not an act of religion to force religion, which ought to be adopted spontaneously, and not by compulsion."

In the year 324 Constantine, the first Christian emperor, attained undisputed and sole authority. A change took place. All arguments in favor of perfect freedom and religious toleration, which are found in all the early apologies, disappear entirely from Christian writings when Constantine ascended the throne of the Cæsars. "In the fourth century multitudes were drawn into a profession of Christianity, not by the power of conviction and arguments, but by the prospect of gain and the fear of punishment."

For the first time Christians saw, in Constantine, a co-believer on the throne. And during his reign "the church grew swiftly in power and influence, a growth much aided by the penal laws passed against paganism. The moment Christianity was able to seize the sword, it wielded it remorselessly, and cut its way to supremacy in the Roman world. Bribes and penalties shared together in the work of conversion."

Before Christianity became a power it could plead for freedom and toleration; after it became a power its pleadings were forgotten. Was it not a wolf in sheep's clothing?

The Number Seven.

From the London Globe.

Pythagoras, who lived before the days of Seven Dials, pronounced the number to belong especially to sacred things; and we find Hippocrates, four and a half centuries before our era, dividing the ages of man into seven, an arrangement afterward adopted by Shakspere. But long before this the Egyptian priests enjoined rest on the seventh day, because they said it was an unlucky day, a dies infaustus, though there is little doubt that this ancient institution of a Sabbath was primarily derived from the Chaldeans.

There were seven planets in Egyptian astronomy, and hence the seven days of the week, each ruled by and named after its proper constellation. The ancient Peruvians had a tradition of the deluge from which seven persons saved themselvs in a cave and repeopled the earth, and the old inhabitants of Mexico similarly traced their descent from a like number of persons, each of whom was hidden in a separate cave during the inundation of water. How this peculiar use of the number spread from the Old to the New World it is impossible to say, hopeless to conjecture. Maybe its marvelously frequent employment is a trait of character common to man.

At any rate there are seven holes in a man's head—two ears, two eyes, two nostrils, and a mouth—and formerly he was supposed to possess seven pairs of nerves. It is noticeable, and certainly singular, that the ancient people of Peru were found to be employing a seven-day week without planetary names for those divisions of time. The ancient Jews considered this number the embodiment of perfection and unity; thus they say the Hebrew letters composing Samuel hav the value of seven, this name having been given to him because of the greatness and perfection of his character.

Undoubtedly seven is the sacred number. There are seven days of creation; after seven days' respit the flood came; the years of famin and plenty were in cycles of seven; every seventh day was a Sabbath; every seventh year the Sabbath of rest; after every seven times seven years came the jubilee; the feasts of unleavened bread and of tabernacles were observed seven days; the golden candlestick had seven branches; seven priests with seven trumpets surrounded Jericho seven times and seven times on the seventh day; Jacob obtained his wives by servitudes of seven years; Samson kept his nuptials seven days, and on the seventh day he put a riddle to his wife, and he was bound with seven green withes, and seven locks of his hair were shaved off; Nebuchadnezzar was seven years a beast; Shadrach and his two companions in misfortune were cast into a furnace heated one seven times more than it was wont.

In the New Testament nearly everything occurs by sevens, and at the end of the sacred volume we read of seven churches, seven candlesticks, seven spirits, seven trumpets, seven seals, seven stars, seven thunders, seven vials, seven plagues, seven angels, and a seven-headed monster. Such are merely a few instances of the sacred use of the number, whose employment in this connection seems common to all nations and all religions.

Not very long ago in England the seventh son of a seventh son was reputed to possess singular powers of healing. The sleepers of Ephesus are seven; Barbarossa changes his position during his long sleep once every seven years; Olger Dansk stamps his iron mace on the floor once during the same period; Olger Redbeard's sleep is so sound in Sweden that his eyelids lift only once in seven years; Tannhauser, while riding on his way to the Wartburg, sees Venus before him in all her loveliness, and getting off his horse, follows her to a cave in the mountains, where he spends seven years in enthrallment. Similarly, in Scotland, Thomas of Ercildoune meets a beautiful lady of the elfin race, who leads him underground, where he remains with her for seven years.

LET us see if the methods of the Rationalist will compare with those of the Christian. The cross of Christ is the great remedy of the Christian. If a man is evil, he is taught that, by an emotional consideration of the death of Jesus, a supernatural change is wrought upon his nature, which will enable him to be good henceforth. This effect is often produced, and in many cases is lasting; but more often, when the emotion has subsided, evil practices are resumed. Under the stimulus of the love of Christ, men resolve to reform their lives; but feeling declines, and temptations conquer. Has the Rationalist a better method of reform? He believes that reason is a more lasting influence than emotion; that the prospect of present benefit is more potent than the hope of future reward; that, as material progress is gained by the study of nature, so moral and mental advance is to come by the study of man's history and habits, and by observation of nature's methods of development. He sees that evil arises from ignorance of natural law, or from non-conformity to its teachings.—R. C. Adams.

Not Convincing Arguments.

In an anniversary address at Sturgis, Mich., under the title of "The Relation of Spiritualism to Christianity," a Spiritualist orator recently said, among other things:

"Spiritualism proffers the key that unlocks the mysteries of the ages. It constituted the foundation-stones of all the ancient faiths. It was the mighty uplifting force that gave to the world its inspired teachers and immortal leaders. The spiritual is the real. God is spirit.

"Pythagoras, the famous Samian, taught that angels and spirits exercised a guardian care over mortals. Socrates had his ever-attending spirit helper to whom he listened. The apostles healed the sick, saw visions, and witnessed transfiguration. Constantine saw a flaming cross in the heavens with the ominous words, 'In this sign shalt thou conquer.' Joan of Arc saw visions and conversed with risen saints. Torquato Tasso frequently heard the voices of spiritual beings. Antony, of Egypt, met angels by the wayside and had holy visions. St. Francis of Assisi put down demons and talked with angels. George Fox, the Quaker, was entranced and had the spiritual gift of healing. The Wesleys heard spiritual sounds and mysterious noises in their home when at prayer. Baron Swedenborg conversed with spirits and angels during twenty-seven years of his eventful life. Savonarola, Bruno, Boehman, and Roger Bacon were Spiritualists, inspired and possessed of mediumistic powers. John Bunyan and Richard Baxter were Spiritualists. Just before Baxter's death he published his work, 'The Certainty of the World of Spirits Fully Evinced by Unquestionable Histories.' Dr. Adam Clark declared his belief that there was a 'spiritual world in which human spirits, both good and bad, lived,' and that 'these spirits hav intercourse with this world and become visible to mortals.' The French president, Thiers, said: 'I am a Spiritualist, an impassioned one, and I am anxious, I repeat, to confound Materialism in the name of science and good sense.' Señor Castelar, professor of history in a Spanish university, is a Spiritualist. 'I believe,' said he, 'that I commune with beloved ones lost to my sight during this my troubled earthly life.' M. Camille Flammarion, the French astronomer, is an avowed Spiritualist. John Bright, the British statesman, said to me in his own mansion, in presence of Mr. Bailey, a poet of some note, that he 'had witnessed marvelous manifestations with D. D. Home and others that he could account for only upon the hypothesis that the agencies were spirits.' Ex-Premier Gladstone, who has investigated the spiritual phenomena, said: 'I know of no rule which forbids a Christian to examin into the signs of preternatural agency in the system called Spiritualism.' While lecturing several months in London upon Spiritualism and cognate subjects, I had no more patient listeners than A. R. Wallace, the naturalist, and C. F. Varley, the electrician. Memories of the past remind me that in other lands I sat in séances with Victor Hugo; H. R. H., the prince of Solms; William Crooks, F. R. S; Leon Favre, consul-general of France, and other eminent statesmen, scientists, savans—all Spiritualists! What a chain of testimonies stretching in golden links adown the ages! My thought this hour is fully expressed in the clear-ringing language of that eminent English naturalist and scientist, Alfred Russel Wallace, F. G. S.: 'My position, therefore,' says he, 'is that the phenomena of Spritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences.'

"The consensus of opinion through the enlightened world to-day admits, no doubt, the verities of Spiritualism. The battle, however, is not yet fully fought. Far from it. There is commotion and mental warfare in the very air. And the great moral and religious battle-ground in the future will be, not between Spiritualism and Christianity, but between Spiritualism and Materialism. The bitterest and most merciless opponents to-day of Spiritualism are such prejudiced scientists as Haeckel, Lancaster, and Huxley. And the Psychical Research investigators are not much better. Their pseudo-methods lead to Sadduceeism, Agnosticism, and bald Materialism."

We make this long extract to point a moral. It contains all the material of the fallacious kind of argument—the authoritativ "I said it;" assumptions without support; the great-men-believed-it, therefore it's true argument; unreasoning denunciation of opponents, and all the other oratorical tricks which catch the ear but fall flat to the ground before the logical reasoner.

"The spiritual is the real; God is spirit." All right, if true; but what is spirit? How can we get hold of it and know of its existence? If we go to a materializing séance, which is the only proof of the assumption of spiritual existence that Spiritualism offers us, we find that we can know nothing of spirit except through matter—that spirit must put on matter to communicate with us to be real. Isn't the dictum, then, that the spiritual is the real a little premature? Similarly, how do we know that God is spirit? All the spirits that Spiritualism shows us are spirits of men and women; God never materialized. So, what proof hav we that God is spirit, admitting that there are spirits? The real to us is what we cognize through our senses; we know of no consciousness without material organization, and the Berkeleyans stumble against a stone wall in the fact that a man exists, endowed with life, before he is conscious of it. Therefore consciousness, which is our orator's "spirit," must follow and not precede organization, going to show that it is the organization, the material, which is the real, and not the knowledge of the organization. And to pronounce spirit to be God is simple theological claptrap, for which there never was, and, in the nature of things, never can be any tangible evidence.

To quote a long list of eminent people who "saw visions" and believed certain things is no proof whatever of anything. The race has always been full of superstition and imagined thousands of things that never existed. Luther saw the devil, he said, but who believes him? Clement of Rome believed that the phenix renewed its life every five hundred years, and Origen defended the belief. Tertullian believed the same. The fellow who wrote the epistle of Barnabas believed that the hyena changes its sex every year; that a hare had as many young as it was years old, and that a weasel conceived with its mouth. Among some of the eastern barbarians it is believed to this day that mothers sometimes giv birth to children through the mouth. Justin Martyr believed in demons, and said they were the offspring of angels who loved the daughters of men. Clement of Alexandria said that plagues and hail storms were caused by demons. Origen believed the sun, moon, and stars to be alive and occasionally inclined to sin. The Christian fathers said that to deny the existence of Incubi and Dusii was an impertinence, so much trustworthy evidence of their existence was there. Thousands of persons testified that two excommunicated nuns buried in the earthen floor of a church used to arise and go out of church till the mass was over, when they returned. As for the belief in witches, it was universal; all the great Christians believed in them. Why not quote them to prove that women really did ride through the air on broomsticks, make cows giv bloody milk, and cause people to fall sick? Surely Clement and Origen and Tertullian were as eminent and as worthy of belief as Antony of Egypt and St. Francis of Assisi.

Because men believe a thing is no proof whatever that it is true. Pythagoras believed in the transmigration of souls. Is metempsychosis a scientifically established fact because he believed it?

Such arguments are ridiculous!

Spiritualism's worst enemies to-day are not the scientists nor the Materialists, but Spiritualists themselvs who make their cause absurd by their superstitious credulity and foolish talk, and Christians who persecute them because Spiritualism is a rival religion. If Spiritualism is a fact, no scientist will deny it when it is so shown. But it cannot be so shown by talk, by theorizing, nor by quoting the belief of dead and gone ignorance. It must be shown by facts which all can see. Spiritualists, and especially the priests of the faith, the mediums, must remember, as Da Vinci long ago proclaimed, the fundamental principle that experiment and observation are the only reliable foundations of reasoning in science, that experiment is the only trustworthy interpreter of nature, and is essential to the ascertainment of laws. It won't do to abuse those who, honestly seeking those facts, find chicanery and jugglery instead of intelligence from another world. Spiritualism should be open and gentle; it can not afford to be arrogant and intolerant. Let it show the world that it has the truth and is not simply another phase of theological and superstitious tyranny over ignorant and credulous mortals. Everybody hopes for immortality—so colossal is the conceit of the race—and Spiritualism, to win the world, has only to show to men that this will be realized.

St. Anthony Again.

Brick Pomeroy's Advance Thought reveals another instance of the moral turpitude and reckless work of Anthony Comstock. A Mrs. Read in Brooklyn, after a heated quarrel with her neighbor, complained to the secretary of the Vice Society that she had received through the United States mail a vile postal card, and that in her opinion the writer was a little twelve-years-old girl, Josie Springer, child of a family she had taken offense at. United States District Attorney John Oakly looked into the case, was satisfied the child was innocent, and refused to apply the machinery of the law to break down the life of a mere child.

Then went Anthony Comstock before Judge Tighe's court, in Brooklyn, who, simply because Anthony Comstock presented the complaint, listened to it. At the trial, no one coming to admit writing the postal card, Comstock, as an "expert," swore that the writing was done by the child defendant. The child denied ever having written or thought of writing to Mrs. Read, therefore, in the opinion of Comstock, concurred in by Judge Tighe because Comstock had so expressed himself, Josie Springer was adjudged guilty of defying the laws and insulting sixty-five millions of people, torn from her home, and ordered imprisoned for one year!

"For this great wrong to a child," says the indignant Brick, "Mrs. Read will yet suffer months of sorrow. Comstock may not suffer, as cruel, cold, selfish, mercenary natures like his are not born to suffer so much as to call attention to what results from clothing a hog with power and converting its heart into a cake of soap. The cities of New York and Brooklyn are full of men who defy law and Anthony Comstock. He dares not proceed against them, but to win applause from those who cheer without examination, singles out a child against whom before nor since has a word been spoken, and to secure the smiles of Mrs. Read, is guilty of a violation of innocence. We trust that every little girl in this country will look upon Anthony Comstock and upon Judge Tighe as contemptible men, each unfit to occupy the station he holds. If there is not a hell for those who abuse the power intrusted to them, there ought to be."

But Comstock is a Christian who has been saved by the blood of the lamb, and would not go to hell if there were such a place!

Representativ Christians.

It is a fact not at all peculiar that the two firms chiefly interested in the reproduction of the Encyclopedia Britannica, which the press of the country hav united in calling a theft, are both presided over by notoriously pious men—Rev. Dr. Funk and Sunday-school Superintendent Wanamaker. Dr. Funk printed the books and Wanamaker sold them, and both defended their action until public clamor grew so loud that Dr. Funk announced that no more orders would be received for the books. The Waterbury American says of the transaction:

"The Rev. Dr. Funk has given in. His firm (Funk & Wagnalls) is one of the firms which hav been stealing a million dollars' worth of property belonging to the Messrs. Black of Edinburgh—in other words, the Encyclopedia Britannica, which the Messrs. Black publish, and to bring out which has cost them an expenditure of $1,000,000. Their looting of this valuable literary venture called forth severe strictures in the press, especially as Dr. Funk is as prominent religiously in Prohibition circles as is Mr. Wanamaker, his fellow-pirate, in Republican circles. Under fire, apparently—for the Messrs. Black cabled that they had received no proposition for remuneration previous to the general press censure—Dr. Funk made remittance to them of part of the plunder. This tender the Messrs. Black rejected as soon as made. Next it was discovered that the pirated edition contained valuable articles and maps written by Americans and copyrighted in this country, but also sold to the Messrs. Black for publication in their Cyclopedia. The Scribners, who held the American copyright, immediately sued Dr. Funk's firm for taking their property, and Judge Shipman of the United States court decided for the Scribners. At first Dr. Funk talked of fighting the decision to the last legal quibble, but, on second thought, it was decided to surrender."

Dr. Funk and Mr. Wanamaker are very prominent representativs of Christianity. One is a strong advocate of pious prohibition, the other is a cabinet officer who uses his position to further the interests of his religion. The Christian church ought to be proud of them.

Cardinal Gibbons and Sunday Observance.

When Cardinal Gibbons wrote favorably of restraining undue hilarity on Sunday by law the American Sabbath Union jumped high from excessiv joy and added seven million Roman Catholics to the petition for the enactment of the Blair Sunday bill. Now that the head of the Romish church in this country has more clearly defined his position, and is in favor of open public libraries and museums, and "innocent relaxation," what will Blair and Crafts and the other fanatics say?

Sunday baseball in Baltimore, the home of Gibbons, has brought about the discussion of the Sunday question in that city, and Cardinal Gibbons contributes this opinion to the quarrel:

"I think that Sunday should be, first of all, a day devoted to religious worship, and second to innocent and healthful recreation, as being the only day in which the great masses of the people hav time to seek relaxation from their work. The danger is in the excess either way, and I entirely agree with Dr. Weld, pastor of the First Independent Christ church, in deprecating the closing of our art galleries, libraries, etc., absolutely to the public. Presupposing that a certain portion of the day is set apart for religious exercises, I think that any recreation that will contribute to the physical, mental, and moral benefit and enjoyment of the masses should be encouraged. I think that baseball is a game that is in conflict with the quiet decorum and tranquillity that should characterize the observance of the Lord's day, and is too violent an exercise to be conduciv to such harmony.

"But whatever may be the abuses arising from Sunday baseball, I regard the baseball players and observers of the game as far less responsible than those who utter from the pulpit on the Lord's day unjust and uncharitable statements about their neighbor. The Christian Sunday is not to be confounded with the Jewish or even with the Puritan Sabbath. It prescribes the golden means between rigid Sabbatarianism on the one hand and lax indulgence on the other. There is little doubt that the revulsion in public sentiment from a rigorous to a loose observance of the Lord's day can be ascribed to the sincere but misguided zeal of the Puritans, who confounded the Christian Sunday with the Jewish Sabbath, and imposed restraints on the people which were repulsiv to Christian freedom, and which were not warranted by the gospel dispensation.

"The Lord's day to the Christian heart is always a day of joy. The church desires us on that day to be cheerful without dissipation, grave and religious without sadness and melancholy. She forbids, indeed, all unnecessary servil work on that day, but as the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, she allows such work whenever charity or necessity may demand it. As it is a day consecrated not only to religion, but to relaxation of mind and body, she permits us to spend a portion of it in innocent recreation."

In this the cardinal follows closely the line long ago drawn by the Romish church authorities. That the church is the authority for Sunday consecration; and that after the people hav been to church, and paid the money demanded, they may spend the rest of the day and their money in doing anything that the church thinks will not weaken them in their devotion to her interests—which are the interests of the priests. The condemnation of baseball is a sop to the American Protestant notion of how Sunday should be spent; in Catholic countries the church is not so fastidious, for Spain enjoys its bullfighting on Sunday, which is a considerably more indecorous game than baseball. Roman Catholism is aspiring to respectability nowadays, and to equal regard with Protestantism in the opinions of Americans. She also aspires to a more than equal share of public cash and influence.

But how will Blair and Crafts and Knowles and Shepard and Frances Willard and the rest of the American Sabbath folks reconcile this opinion by Cardinal Gibbons with his alleged advocacy of the Blair Sunday Rest Bill?

Some Antiques.

We do not know the age of Judge Pennybacker, of Philadelphia, but his sentiments indicate that he has arrived at that time of life when justices are entitled to retire from activ duty.

In the case of the People against Waldman, a barber of the Quaker City, for shaving a customer on Sunday, Justice Pennybacker said: "It is contended on the part of the defendant that since there are some persons whose beards require shaving daily, and there are some whose occupations through the week make it impossible for them to get shaved except upon Sunday, the conduct of defendant's business upon the day in question was a work of necessity. It seems to me quite obvious that this argument is a fallacy. If it had appeared that the work which was done, was limited to such persons, there would be ground for the allegation; but otherwise it would result in the entire abrogation of the act of 1794."

Veneration for age may, under certain circumstances, be beautiful to behold; and so may be people who serve to connect the pushing present with the fading past. But such excessiv veneration for an ancient statute will probably not be found to be held by anyone else outside of Philadelphia or New Jersey; and as for the judge himself he can with plausibility request retirement on a pension on the age of his sentiments alone. No one would think of disputing his claim.

Justice Pennybacker also decided in the same case that the shavee is equally liable with the shaver, and this recalls the narrow escapes the Freethinkers had at the last congress of the American Secular Union and the recklessness, not to say treachery to liberty, of President Westbrook in assembling the heretics in Philadelphia. If all of them had been arrested, would President Westbrook's real estate hav been sufficient to secure their appearance in court Monday morning? What if THE TRUTH SEEKER reporter, who never shaved himself but once, and that with Editor Washburn's razor at White Sulphur Springs, had, after diving into the hotel basement, through the bootblack's room, past the lavatory, around a corner to the right, down an alley lined with whisky barrels, over some benches, and then through an iron door into a barber shop locked and barred and screened—what if, after this journey, he had been arrested and taken away to Judge Pennybacker's court, how would the Liberals of the country ever hav known what the Secular Union congress did? Yet it might hav been done under the statute of 1794, and the reporter's mantle of constitutional rights torn into shreds. President Westbrook cannot be easily forgiven for exposing the delegates to such fearful risks; for however greatly one admires the antique, laws of 1794 and judges like Magistrate Pennybacker are too musty to make encounter with them agreeable or profitable.

"A Thoughtless Yes."

Congratulations of Helen Gardener are now in season on her success in entering the field of literature as literature, with a moral. Her book, "A Thoughtless Yes," has jumped into popularity with a bound, the first edition selling within eight days. Bret Harte and Robert Louis Stevenson are about the only writers of short stories who can command such interest, some of the writers for Scribner's and the Century magazines being content if enough are sold within the year to pay the cost of production. That Miss Gardener's radical stories should be read as eagerly as they are confirms Colonel Ingersoll's opinion that in this work she has found her field, where her dramatic genius can better reach the people than by direct preaching.

The majority of collections of short stories are mere time-killers, dealing with no questions and stirring no thought. These, on the contrary, touch topics of law, heredity, labor, religion, and other matters to which the general public hav heretofore "paid the tribute of a thoughtless yes," and the interest in them, by means of this style of presentation, indicates that "timid acquiescence" is growing curious if not bold. It is a triumph for Miss Gardener, of more import than mere personal gratification, that such radical tales hav won their immediate way to public regard. It is a straw in the indications of our cause, and Captain Adams's prophecy that "fun, fiction, and fashion" are to be the strongest weapons against orthodoxy finds corroboration in the rapid sale of the book.

With a few of the stories our readers are already familiar, as they hav appeared in these columns, two of them being written for us. In every one of them, as the Newark Advertiser admiringly says, there is a vein of freshness and originality which is truly charming. "The narrativs are entertaining, and the incidental ideas are often novel and striking. It is decidedly no 'thoughtless yes' to assent to the statement that they are an entire literary success." In some one of the stories will be found something to touch every reader. Freethinkers, Labor Reformers, and Woman Suffragists all find material for missionary work among their neighbors in the pages. As Matilda Joslyn Gage, president of the Woman's National Liberal Union, says of the story, "For the Prosecution," "it is at once strong and pathetic and true—oh, so true! But the world does not know; it is stupidly ignorant, blinded by the Bible theory of woman's creation for man. Ah, the church! It has damned woman and the world—the world so fearful, so superstitious, that it dares not investigate and does not know that it sinks with all the injustice it does! And those who, greedy for power, care not by what means it is gained! What slavery ever yet compared to the bondage of the will, to the destruction of free thought?" Of the complete work Colonel Ingersoll says: "I think the stories are marvelously good. Miss Gardener certainly has dramatic genius. She should put all her ideas, theories, and fancies into the form of story; it is far better than the direct preaching, because it touches the artistic sense and reaches the heart and brain through the perception of the beautiful and dramatic. I hope that she will write a dozen short stories, and print them first in book form. Their success is assured."

Like Mrs. Gage, we are all proud of our beautiful story writer, thankful for her, and hope she will liv long to do much more good by her pen and voice.

Editorial Notes.

UNBELIEVERS will say, "There is no providence." "Do you see that wheat?" said one of them to a Christian. "I planted it on Sunday; I cultivated it on Sunday; it is the best crop in the country, and I will harvest it on Sunday." The sensible reply was: "God does not always settle his accounts with sinners in October." To which his word in many passages adds, says the Christian Advocate: "Nor in this mortal life." Which is a Methodistical way of saying that God will take it out of us when he gets us in hell. Cheering belief!

WHEN the ministerial mind dives into every-day affairs it sometimes brings up great chunks of wisdom. This reflection is induced by reading the following exhortation to the ministerial brethren of the Rev. Jim Buckley in the Christian Advocate. He is writing about "Vacation:" "Ministers and editors are in the habit of urging Christians to be especially careful in their conduct when away from home. Such advice is necessary; but a wise layman, who has traveled much and is not censorious, assures us that, in his judgment, many ministers are less careful than average laymen. We fear that his opinion has too much foundation. A word to the truly wise should be sufficient. Brethren in the ministry, let us so speak and act that no layman can find in our word or conduct an excuse for impropriety of deportment or neglect of the duties which we inculcate at home." If the brethren will only lay this exhortation to heart, there will be fewer scandals for the newspapers to chronicle. Summer is the time for camp-meeting, and camp-meetings are great trials to the godly.

THE Rev. Henry Frank, of Jamestown, N. Y., has been expelled from the Western New York Association of Congregational churches on resolutions charging him with "a lack of faith in a personal God, the deity of Jesus Christ, and the inspiration of the Bible; with holding up to derision doctrins and views dear to the hearts of the Evangelical Christians." There is no doubt that the charges are true, for Mr. Frank has for two or three years been a heretic, but the unfairness shown in "trying" him reflects great discredit upon the Congregationalists. Mr. Frank was given but a few days to prepare his defense; "the judge, jury, and prosecuting attorney were all one, the evidence was all in before the court opened, and the verdict rendered before the accused had time to recover from his astonishment. Nothing," says the Jamestown Sun, "in the history of ecclesiastical procedure can be found to compare with it for the unrelenting speed with which every movement was executed." Mr. Funk lectures every Sunday to an independent congregation, which followed him from the orthodox church, and publishes a little journal full of heresy, but not of the radical sort.

JOSEPH HENRY.

WEST RANDOLPH, VT., July 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is too bad that our people come forward so slowly in financial aid in the cause of liberty, truth, reason, and justice, when old fables under the guise of "Thus saith the Lord" receive the money they do. If I was able, I would like to giv more. SAMUEL BASS.

ELMORE, ILL., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I can hardly get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not able to read it myself. My wife reads the most of it to me. My eye is but little, if any, better. Not being able to help in the good cause, is what hurts your humble servant. DENNIS MORRIS.

ARCH BEACH, CAL., June 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5—$3 to apply to my subscription, and $2 for the cartoon book. I shall place the book in my hotel library at Arch Beach. The cartoons are the best arguments that I can use on our benighted Christian brethren. H. S. GOFF.

MAROUS, IA., June 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much interested in your paper, and I will do all in my power to get subscribers for the same. I hav showed it to orthodox Christians, who receive it with the remarks, "Don't giv us such poisonous papers," and, "If you read such papers, you will surely go to hell." That is the opinion of those near-sighted people who hate the truth and the light. Yours truly, NELS PEARSON.

BLACK JACK GROVE, TEX., July 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As Dr. Radford says, may Heston and Peck l v long to paint 'em and "peck" 'em. Brother Longshore, I love to read your articles. I would like to read an article from Colonel Ingersoll occasionally. He is a very brilliant light in the Freethought world, the foremost orator of the age.

As I am here alone, it would afford me much pleasure indeed to correspond with some of the Liberal young ladies if I can possibly obtain their address. JOSEPH STIDHAM.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME,
LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Accept inclosed money for the picture book and a continuance of your invaluable TEUTH SEEKER—yes, more than that, also truth finder. O sentinels, pickets, skirmishers for mental liberty, persevere in order to keep secular our American Constitution and save it from the danger of the dark spirit of inquisition which is forging shackles for the destruction of intellectual liberty and progress! F. LEBER, SR.

BUZZARD'S BAY, MASS., July 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Although dollars are dollars with me in my old age, I shall try hard to keep my name on your list while I stop on this side of life. It cannot be long. I am close to eighty. After years of hard thinking on the evidence that I hav had, I cannot doubt a continued life without doing violence to my best-reasoned conclusions. I hav no strong desire to make converts of my Agnostic friends. They are my trusty companions in arms against religious despotism, and deception whatever name it may bear.

E. O. PARKE.

ATTLEBORO, MASS., June 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I thought I would inquire of you about what time the picture book will be out. I am going to send for fifteen books, and I am going to try for twenty. Five men hav paid me their $2; mine and four more that hav agreed to pay me in August make ten books that you are sure of. Five more say they will take it. Some more want to know how long they will hav to wait for the book, so if you will tell me about when to expect it, it will oblige me very much. Remember every book I send for is a vote for the pictorial Bible. E. C. SLY.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., June 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to find that you are so impartial in the management of your paper as to giv all sides a hearing upon any question or subject. I find by the communications published that some of your subscribers are believers in the phenomena of Spiritualism. Now, I would suggest that all who are convinced that there is reality in the matter, and that from their knowledge all is not humbug, would so manifest it through your paper that we may know how many there are. You can class me as one. None should be ashamed to make known their honest convictions in this respect, or, for that matter, in any other respect.

WILLIAM HART.

RICHMOND, VA., July 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am, and hav been for the last two years, in the slimy coils of that terrible monster, the Presbyterian church. My last payment falls due on the first day of August, which will relieve my little all from the grasp of a revengeful Christian tyrant. Yes, you will readily understand how we—a little band of us—sympathize with you and your noble work, when I tell you that we hav carried the war to the very altar of the most holy of holy tabernacles of this place. We hav plucked from the anxious seat over fifty men and women, and created a general stagnation in the Second Presbyterian church, for which it has tried to swallow us alive. But, thank God, the first of the coming month will set us free, when we propose to renew the battle with renewed vigor. I hope soon to send you a detailed account of our mode of operation, also an account of our success. E. H. BAKER.

MONTAGUE, TEX., June 29, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I want to sell our home and go to the Kaweah Colony. I hav a son there, but I cannot sell here for enough to get there. Our home has been valued as high as $2,500, but we could not get $300 for it now in money down. We are between two railroads. It is a county site. and there is a good school here. A railroad would make us all right. There may be a cross-road some time that will help us out.

I am circulating petitions for Harman, doing all I can in Liberal work, but this Christian ignorance is a hard thing to fight. There is a protracted meeting running in our hearing most of the time. They hav to keep it going to keep the converts from backsliding. There is a batch of converts just on, so we will hav to guard all things or they will be stolen. Of course there are a few good people here, but no Liberals that take Liberal papers. They are afraid of the church influence or that their business will be injured.

Yours truly, GEO. W. CARPENTER.

CHATEAU, MONT., July 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav never noticed any news from these parts in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it would not go amiss to inform your readers that ministers in this part of Montana are not getting rich. People hav healthy minds, and do not need their medicin. The writer has made it his business for the last two years to draw from people, in a sort of disinterested way, their opinion upon religion. Your correspondent did not want them to know his opinion first lest it should hav some influence over them. A good three-fourths of them are not Christians. Many of them are Atheists. These are generally the smartest men I meet. Now and then a Spiritualist comes along. Some of them hav everyone's opinion but none of their own. This class never fails to be hollow between the eyebrows, and directly above the root of the nose. The tracts that you will send will be distributed among my friends and enemies. I do what little I can around here to promote the rights of man, and would be pleased to do a little elsewhere if I had the power.

WM. BEVAN.

RED CANON, WYO., July 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The subject of hypnotism is now receiving more attention from scientific men than ever before. It is a subject that is particularly worthy the attention of Liberals. When a man perceives the established creeds of the old churches to be radically wrong and resolves to base his convictions alone upon science and reason, he is often too willing to see in Spiritualism proofs of a life hereafter, which is the hope that the old religions hav fostered, and which he, when renouncing their creeds in the main, is most unwilling to forego. Usually when men argue as disinterested seekers for truth their remarks are free from rancor and personality; yet some Spiritualists in their letters treat an Atheist as though he was anxious to rob them of the sweet luxury of a life hereafter. For ages religions hav compelled men to bow down to an assumed personality (a God) and prepare for a second life (a heaven). Thus no wonder feelings relating to these mental states hav become hereditary, and as soon as science rendered ecclesiastical ideas untenable men looked for phenomena that would seem to substantiate the belief in a God and a heaven. To each of these beliefs, owing to inherited cerebral structure, there were pleasurable feelings attached. For the Antichristian, then, there were a class of phenomena to which he could go and seem to obtain proof of a life hereafter. These phenomena are now included under the name hypnotism, and just as surely as geology undermined Genesis, hypnotism will cast to the winds the hopes based upon Spiritualism. DR. BOYNTON.

CRESCO, IA., July 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Since the end of May my time has been absorbed in the census business. It seems a wonder that I, an outspoken Infidel, did receive this appointment when a number of church-going applicants were in the field against me. Perhaps the novelty in the case did it. My recommendation contained the names of a rather motley lot, viz., a Roman Catholic congressional aspirant and ex-senator (state), a Methodist banker and two Methodist publishers (county papers), a Baptist clerk of court, a mugwump county recorder, a nondescript county auditor, a ditto sheriff, a half-Spiritualistic county treasurer, a hypocritical county superintendent of schools, a church-going lawyer, a few soul (dollar) saving merchants, and last but not least an Infidel lawyer. What in the name of all invented Gods is to be done if each of these fellows should expect and demand, for favors received, that I should eventually and permanently take sides with him on the chances of heaven or some other nowhere? The last named (Infidel lawyer) would be my choice if only he could be induced to be as brave in the expression of his religious sentiments as he is forward in the courtroom. I hope the numbering of the people this time will not hav so bad an effect on us common Israelites as it did in the time of the much-bewomaned man-after-God's-own-heart (David), without the then instructing two lords (God and Satan). FRED. S. DAUBERSMITH.

BLOOMDALE, O., June 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: John Peck's letter in the last two issues of your good paper concerning the Catholic church, and, in fact, a thorough acquaintance with the institution, make me wish for a voice as loud as thunder to proclaim to the multitude the doings of these bloated, blackcoated wolves in human form. Every individual in this great country should be informed of the inner workings of this abominable pestilential institution. The oath of installation taken by the Jesuits should be put in pamphlet form and circulated a million-fold. Every Freethought man should take avail of each opportunity to expose this agglomeration of condensed evil, and to point out this biggest and blackest spot on the pages of history. And what a hollow pretense she makes—ostensibly for our weal and improvement, but really for her own gain and aggrandizement! The idea that such a hideous monster, shriveled and blood-begrimed, should claim beauty and respectability, and in the latter end of the nineteenth century hurl her denunciations at our public schools and institutions and call them hotbeds of immorality, when, forsooth, most of us know the facts to be just the reverse, is just too irksome! Ho for a lot of us to "peck" away at the old hag of a church and arouse public sentiment on this theme. Thoroughly educate all on this point, even the Catholics, and erelong she will hav to reef in her sails and come to and get out of the list of contestants for common favor. Her record, above all others, is too sulphurous, too fiery, too bloody, too cursed and horrible, to merit the countenance of any thinking man. C. C. G.

ROANOKE, VA., July 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2.60 for the picture book, the ANNUAL, and the June 28th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I hav lost by its falling into the hands of a Christian, who destroyed it.

And now I would like to ask your opinion, and through your columns, that of your readers, if we disbelievers in superstition should not hav a secret society for mutual support and protection. For my part, there seems to me to be great necessity for it. Our enemies nearly all belong to some one or more. Every honest disbeliever is debarred from Masonry, Oddfellowship, and nearly every friendly and benevolent society, because to join we must believe, or pretend to, in some hobgoblin of a god. I feel the necessity for such a society more than ever here, submerged as I am in an ocean of bigotry, superstition, and hypocrisy. If I should die here, what would become of my little family and the home I hav gathered around them? The Christian children are taught to call my children heathens, because we do not go to church and Sunday-school. What would they do if their supporter and protector was gone? We know well enough the power of the Masons and Oddfellows—how they stand by, befriend, and protect each other. We also know the power of the Jesuits—how they cling to each other like a burch of snakes, and you cannot touch one without stirring up the whole pack. Why should we always expose ourselvs in the open field while our enemies are forever in ambush? It might embrace an institution, built by the society, where our orphan children could be educated, a home for the aged, and likely more. JOSIAH FRIEND.

DAYTON, WASH., July 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which please renew my subscription to your valuable paper, and send me the picture book. You may observe there are plenty more votes for Heston if the opposition had shown up strong enough to call them out. They were much like the Spiritualists—they were all taking notes, but so long as all intelligent objections were answered they did not think it necessary to chip in, but they are among your readers all the same. In relation to the spiritual question (if a man die, shall he liv again?), whether it be one phase of the question or another giving evidence of the same, there has been little advanced by your correspondents on the negativ side that I could not hav answered very easily, and I hav had but limited means of investigation, and then had to pursue it against the church on the one side and the skeptic on the other, and it is hard to say which was the most unreasonable. Each phase of the phenomena that has been advanced by the super-mundane (not supernatural, as many of your correspondents designate them) intelligences, has been explained in about one hundred ways, and I hav refuted them one after another until the inventiv genius of the skeptic gave out, and then he began denunciations upon general terms. It is the same with many writers in your valuable paper. They seem to leave all their intelligence and candor behind them so soon as they approach the subject of immortality. A thousand facts are as nothing to one of their suppositions. And lastly comes one who knows so much about mesmerism that he knows all who hav ever witnessed any phenomenon that has not come under his own observation hav been subjected to that power. I hav met personally a number of such philosophers, and they invariably get upset in the very first encounter. Let them write about what they know, and be willing to learn the alphabet of other subjects before they set up for teachers or critics, like so many of your able contributors, whose thoughts and observations it is a pleasure and a profit to peruse. DR. G. ORCHARD.

IPAVA, ILL., July 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a short letter from the pen of Hon. Thomas P. Duncan. Now, it comes to me that it is very essential for all who get THE TRUTH SEEKER to pass it around, for it was through the reading of a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Duncan became a subscriber for your valuable paper. He, like the writer, is a devoted admirer of Colonel Ingersoll, John Peck, and Heston, but my admiration extends beyond these great and brilliant word and pencil painters. The mothers of the above and heroes gone hav my lasting and deepest respect. "O woman, thou wert made to temper man!" O mothers, thou art and hav been the womb of all intelligence and progression, because, according to history, every man—with one exception—had a mother. I am glad John Peck is getting in his cannon shots on the Catholic and doctrinal curse of man. Let every reader of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER use it, and his every effort, to pull the scales from his neighbors' eyes, that the sun of reason may shine in on their minds a little to eradicate the opaque and pessimistic teachings of superstition, that they may see the trickery and chicanery. Giv Blair and the Prohibitionists and the God-in-the-Constitution party the power to prohibit, and progress or evolution of the mind will be devolution. They will not only tell us what we shall eat and drink, but what we shall say and think. Why, the time is here when we need a Paine to teach and a Henry to exhort. Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not, the thing which so nearly concerns their temporal salvation? Is it any wonder Henry said, "Giv me liberty or giv me death?" Every lover of liberty must be on the alert and keep the old flag above the cross, or the iron heel of "Submit yourselvs to the powers that be" will tear down the flag and the beauties and comforts of liberty will be gone. I close as I commenced, scattering papers.

Yours for humanity, C. S. RANDOLPH.

NEOLA, IA., July 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In Burr Oak, Mich., on June 29th, my father, eighty-nine years old, passed out of this life into his everlasting sleep. He never made any profession of religion and never took any stock whatever in the churches or the Bible. I was there to visit him only a few days before he died, and the last words he said to me on the subject of death were that he believed in the Ingersoll theory. He is one more to the large number of unbelievers that hav passed from this life without any fear whatever of the future. His life has been a life of usefulness. He was ready to grasp any and all truths and hold fast to them. I do not think any man or woman on earth can say that he ever wronged them. He never trusted in God to pay his debts. He died a poor man in dollars and cents, as all men do that never seek for anything but what honestly belongs to them. He would sell the last thing he had to pay an honest debt. If all men were like him there would be no millionaires and all would hav a plenty to make themselvs comfortable. I am now fifty-six years old and I hav the first man to see that has made a fortune that would not grasp every dollar he saw in sight whether it belonged to him or not, if he could do so and evade the law. Oh, how I long to see the Bellamy theory carried out, and do away entirely with individual ownership. Then and not until then will every man hav his share of this world's goods. How anyone but a selfish, bigoted person can object to this theory is a wonder to me. I hav bought and sent afloat three copies of "Looking Backward," and I only wish that every man and woman in the land would get and read it. All the glowing pictures of heaven made by the ministers are nothing to compare with a government under the Bellamy theory. I am going to try and get up an organization here to promulgate those doctrins. Oh, gentlemen, when I read of the Christian persecution that is going on in this country it fairly makes me shudder. It reminds me forcibly of what we would hav to come to if the church only had the power. How can people with the first particle of liberality or disposition to do unto others as they wish others to do to them rest contented and seemingly unconcerned about our future welfare? If the churches ever get the power it will be like living in a community of horse-thieves—it will be necessary to belong in order to be safe, and the outsiders of the church will hav no show at all.

want everyone to examin the platform of the new political party of Michigan, and I sincerely hope every state will organize a new party and indorse their platform. The world is still moving in progression, and there is some hope if we continue to work with all our might.

Yours forever, a truth seeker, D. W. WHITNEY.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME,
QUINCY, ILL., July 7, E.M. 290

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to express my sincere gratitude to you for the inestimable gift of your invaluable paper, issue of the 5th ult. Like all of the copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it abounds in overwhelming arguments, testimonies, and condemnations simultaneously for the overthrow of Christianity. Yet if I am allowed to criticise, I wish to offer a few thoughts for the consideration of your readers upon the best plan to manipulate propagandism. Women control us. It seems to me that the Women's Liberal convention has opened up for us the right channel. Men as well as women are apt to yield to the influence of the softer sex, and as Mrs. Eliza Archard Connor said, the clergy are standing upon a high platform supported by the Women. Now, if the Women's Liberal Union would select trustworthy propagandists, whose duty would be to travel, lecture, and distribute Freethought literature and TRUTH SEEKER copies, and solicit subscribers, it seems to me it would be a laudable and profitable enterprise. And for the further encouragement of such I promis to furnish for the same nearly $100 worth of books, and $10 in cash, as soon as Uncle Sam has distributed the pension fund. I am proscribed as "Bob," "Bobby," and "Ingersoll." I am making many friends, converts and enemies. I hav many hot discussions. I hav been ordered to silence by our commanding officer, but told him I should not neglect my duty on his account. I keep the Freethinker's Magazine circulating through the Home, so the good work is being stirred up. I hav made arrangements for Remsburg to lecture here this fall, and expect to make engagements at Hannibal, Mo., when I hear from him.

I will add a word on the vital importance of a radical change to an improved vocabulary. Inasmuch as a perfect language is essential to perfect knowledge and understanding of all matters and subjects, and whereas our language is very defectiv, I hereby appeal to the writers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it is, so far as I know, the most advanced journal, to giv their views as to the best method of compiling a dictionary which in the future will be approved, and at the same time rid our language of much dross and confusion. Such words as the infinit, supernatural, divine, revelation, soul, spirit, God, devil, hell, etc.—all and many more such words seem to hav their foundation only in fancy, and are misnomers. EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

COALING, ALA., June 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The letter you received from Troutman, the hog-raiser, exhibits the animus of a conceited bigot. He is a match for Holy John. But that is just the sort of folks I liv among, and if you will imagin every man in northern Tennessee like him then you will hav a pretty good idea of my surroundings. I got you a subscriber at Coaling. He came to me the other day and said, "Mr. Ward, they giv me hell." "Who?" said I. "One no more than another—all. They call it Ward's paper." You see it takes nerve to stand persecution. I asked him why they did not come to me. I would giv them hell. This is why it is impossible to keep up a circulation of the paper. There are but few that are posted on the Bible. That is where we lack.

I inclose $1 for Harman, and will yet make one of one thousand to giv from $1 to $5 to test an Agnostic's rights in all the courts.

Now, if you will let me, I will tell J. W. Mehaffey, of Concord, N. C., how hard I contended for my rights in the state whose honor I fought for from 1861 to 1865, and now I am an outlaw—as are all Infidels, but many do not know it, and I hav thought some wanted to suppress the information lest it might hurt the cause. I do not think that way. Though Spartans' valor had been displayed on many a bloody field, it never shone more conspicuously than when they knew their doom, at Thermopylæ. "Come, let us dine cheerfully, for to-night we will sup with Pluto!" I brought suit for an honest contract, for value received. When I and my witnesses stepped out to be qualified for evidence, I never held up my hand. The defendant called the court's attention to it. He, the court, replied that Mr. Ward was not going to take an oath but was going to affirm. The court, after qualifying my witnesses, looked up at me and said, "Mr. Ward, if you don't take an oath you can't testify." I turned from the court saying I would not do it then. So the defendant was discharged, and costs was assessed against me. I then wrote to a prominent lawyer in Birmingham, asking him if an Agnostic had the right to testify in a court of law. He wrote back that an Agnostic was one without knowledge, and a person without knowledge was not a competent witness. I then wrote to Ingersoll. He wrote that I had no remedy—I had better emigrate. I then wrote to one of the supreme judges of Alabama. He referred me to Greenleaf's Decisions, which says that one without religion can't be a witness. I then wrote to the editor of the Independent Pulpit to bring our cause before the Texas Liberals and let us test our rights as one man, and he declined. I offered to fee a lawyer at my expense through all the courts. I then wrote to Chief-justice Fuller, inclosing stamps, to know if a man that paid taxes and served the state in all it required of him was not entitled to its protectection though he did not believe in any religion. He never answered. I then wrote to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He wrote to me he would do all he could, he would bring my case before the people, but to write to Judge Westbrook. I did so. He wrote there was no money in the treasury, and besides they were more interested to get the Nine Demands just now. Mr. Mehaffey, your doom is fixed. You and all of us stand beyond the ægis of law. Though the meanest believer should assault you or your family and rob you, your lips are sealed. I set about finding out what states recognized us. I found but four, and that only partially. Blasphemy laws still exist here. I can and do say, damn any God that would make such a book as the Christian Bible. And right here I want to say, the man or woman that veils their actions and dissembles for the sake of popularity degrades his or her progeny to creep and crawl through life sole leather for others. Look at individuals, families, nations, that hav been forced to acquiesce in things they did not believe, and they are dissemblers as a rule. The laws of this country are debasing the people. The church is trying to suppress all opposition. Not long ago a preacher told me THE TRUTH SEEKER and all such would be suppressed in the mails. We do not know all their tricks. It is like two armies about to join battle. Let us do our best. H. J. WARD.

BROOKLYN, July 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Lord Byron once made his publisher a present of a Bible inscribed on the fly-leaf with the hortatory, "Search the scriptures, for they are they which testify of me." The publisher was delighted with the gift, but often wondered why his not over-pious lordship should select that particular book for a testimonial, but his wonder ended when one day he happened to turn to John xviii, 40, and read, "Now Barrabbas was a publisher."

"Ye blind guides, that strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." "Woe unto you Pharisees, hypocrits! for ye outwardly appear righteous unto men, but within ye are full of hypocrisy and iniquity." Search the scriptures, ye Comstocks, ye Gerrys, ye judges and juries of obscenity, and all ye of the morally particular but not particularly moral suppressors of vice, for they testify of you.

But will ye "search the scriptures," as ye are exhorted from the pulpit to do? I defy you to do so, and then with any consistency or decency send such men as Harman and Heywood to jail for sending obscene matter through the mails. Ye Pharisees, hypocrits! Did you ever receive a Bible or send a Bible through the mail? Then you hav both received and sent obscene and filthy matter through the mail, and you ought all of you to be in stripes with Harman. Did you ever get a birthday present of a Bible from your mother or father or a friend, with a prayerful exhortation to "diligently search the scriptures?" Then were you not shocked to get, and your mother, father, or friend ashamed to giv you, a nicely bound book that contained within its covers such outrageously filthy, obscene, and indecent stories, which you must hav read if you hav "searched the scriptures?"

Of course you, who hav sent that bad man Harman to jail, are all pious men, in whose veins courses the fire of religious zeal for moral purity. None but men of the most exalted piety could judge Harman and condemn him, and we know that no man can be elected to the bench in this country unless he be a man of the highest morality and the most spotless chastity. It is a judge's duty to uphold public morals. That is what he is there for; to see to it that every evil doer gets the jail that is due him; to see to it that all ballot-box stuffers, all "blocks-of-fivers," all "fat friers," all boodlers, lobbyists, and all $400,000-election-fund raisers are driven with a scourge out of the holy temple of our thrice holy republic. Well then, seeing that swift and terrible retribution always comes on these miscreants, are we going to allow our God-founded republic to be overthrown by a lot of people who mention certain physiological facts which are too shocking to be mentioned in print? It is truly awful that such people should be allowed at large. Why, such people, if not restrained, would even go so far as to expose their naked legs at the seaside. Do not we all remember how Mrs. James Brown Potter—or James Potter Brown—once recited "'Ostler Joe," and shocked a lot of ladies who would rather hav been at Queen Victoria's reception of half-naked ladies than hav heard it?

How thankful we ought to be that in this republic of monopolies and trusts, and tariffs and election thefts, and legislativ steals and jobs, and infernally paved streets handed over to the elevated railway, steam-heating, gas, water, and electric light and power thieves, this republic where hoodlums and pigmies come ever to the top, ought we not, I say, to be thankful that there are found at least twelve righteous men in our Sodom who hav the courage to save us by sending "obscene" men through the penitentiary?

And when these doughty champions of public holiness rest themselvs in the house of God on the blessed Sabbath, how uplifting the sight of the white-robed man of God intoning a portion from that gilt-edged, richly bound "word of God," which for the life of him he dare not read out aloud at some portions. You drowsy judges, how quickly you would be wide awake were your pulpit man to take his text out of some chapters I could name. Would not your heart thump if he were to simply read out aloud some "portions" of the word of God so monstrously obscene and vile that Harman's crime would pale into nothing by contrast? And what would you do about it? Indict him for reading the word of God? Would you call in Saint Anthony and seize him and his obscene literature? or would you wriggle and squirm in your own legal trap, and learnedly split hairs on the difference between sanctified filth and unsanctified physiological utterances? Or would you try to show that filthy stories that hav been circulating four thousand years hav established their right of eminent domain? In which case how old must a filthy story be and how many editions must it go through to be exalted to a place on gilt-edged leaves, between gold and velvet covers, on velvet cushions in the holy of holies?

Woe unto you Pharisees, hypocrits! You hav family reading of the scriptures and prayers. Of course you hav, and when you hav read around to a certain chapter you skip it, and the children wonder why papa has missed one, and for the life of you you dare not explain. You do not want to blush crimson before your family, and make them blush crimson too. And yet you do not mind carrying the Bible in your satchel, in your trunk, giving it as a present to young people, asking them to "read it every day," sending it through the mails, and even putting it on the table in court to swear witnesses on. So the witnesses against Harman and Heywood swore on a book of filthily obscene stories that they sent obscene matter through the mails.

Ye blind guides, that strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. Are ye not indictable on the same charge? Cannot we indict every good Christian for buying, selling, keeping, giving away, and circulat ng obscene matter, beginning with the president, the postmaster, Saint Anthony, and Harman's judge? If not, why not? Yea, why not?

Children's Corner.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

[FOR RECITATION.]

The People's Advent.

'Tis coming up the steep of time,
And this old world is growing brighter!
We may not see its dawn sublime,
Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground,
When it awakes the world in wonder;
But we hav felt it gathering round,
And heard its voice of living thunder.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

'Tis coming now, the glorious time,
Foretold by seers and sung in story;
For which, when thinking was a crime,
Souls leaped to heaven from scaffolds gory!
They passed, nor saw the work they wrought,
Nor the crowned hopes of centuries blossom!
But the live lightning of their thought
And daring deeds, doth pulse earth's bosom.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Creeds, empires, systems, rot with age,
But the great people's ever youthful!
And it shall write the future's page,
To our humanity more truthful!
The gnarliest heart hath tender chords,
To waken at the name of "brother,"
And time comes when brain-scorpion words
We shall not speak to stint each other.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Freedom! the tyrants kill thy braves;
Yet in our memories liv the sleepers,
Though murdered millions feed the graves
Dug by death's fierce red-handed reapers;
The world shall not forever bow
To things which mock God's own endeavor;
Tis nearer than they wot of now
When flowers shall wreathe the sword forever.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Fraternity! love's other name!
Dear, heaven-connecting link of being!
Then shall we grasp thy golden dream,
As souls, full-statured, grow far-seeing.
Thou shalt unfold our better part,
And in our life-cup yield more honey:
Light up with joy the poor man's heart,
And love's own world with smiles more sunny.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Ay, it must come! The tyrant's throne
Is crumbling with our hot tears rusted;
The sword earth's mighty hav leaned on
Is cankered, with our heart's blood crusted.
Room! for the men of mind make way!
Ye robber rulers, pause no longer;
Ye cannot stay the opening day;
The world rolls on, the light grows stronger—
The people's advent's coming!

A Mistake.

A little cloud, one summer day,
While roaming o'er the sky so blue,
Began to scowl and pout, and say,
"Oh dear! what is there I can do?"

Now, just below it, midst the corn,
An old man stood, with hoe in hand,
In tattered clothing, all forlorn—
He seemed at work upon the land.

"Ha! ha!" the cloudlet laughed, and said,
"Now here's a chance to hav some fun!
I'll rain upon your hoary head,
My ancient friend, and make you run!"

But though the cloud rained hard and fast,
The farmer wouldn't budge a bit,
Till in a pet the cloud at last
Cried out, "I never saw such grit!"

Because the farmer wouldn't scare,
It sulked and frowned the livelong day.
How could it know the figure there
Was just to keep the crows away?

GOOD CLOTHES.

Do I believe in fine clothes? Certainly, but not extra fine. You feel better in a new, clean suit than in an old one. Good clothes confer upon the wearer a certain respect and courage that cannot always obtain with inferior or ragged clothing. If seeking employment the well-dressed person is far more apt to obtain favor than the ill-dressed. In a certain way good clothing is a preventiv of crime. It is not common to associate evil with fine apparel, though it sometimes happens that the wearer of elegant clothes is a big scoundrel. But rags and wretchedness generally go together. Vice, crime, and squalor are more nearly allied than good intentions and rags. Not that one may not be well intentioned, honorable, and upright in tatters and living in a hovel, but a person of the above character will not, as a rule, be found in ill conditions—at least, he will soon find a way out of them, if well and strong.

Of course the clothing must be adapted to the work one is doing. An hostler in a stable should not wear fine broadcloth, but he should be the gentleman everywhere, in the stable or drawing-room. The girl who washes dishes will not stand at the sink in white silk, although not lacking in the elements of true womanhood in the pantry or the parlor.

Clothing should be adapted to the work we are doing. It should be as neat and clean as possible. In society one should endeavor to appear as well dressed as the average, not in the extreme of fashion, nor yet very far behind it. Neatness and elegant simplicity are always preferable to gaudy display.

The wise person will not be lavish in expenditures of dress, nor will he be in debt to his tailor. It is silly to indulge in costly dress, besides being cruel toward some who hav not the means to purchase even the commonest clothing.

There is a satisfaction in being able to earn your own clothes. "Behold the lilies of the field: they toil not; neither do they spin; yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Of course not. You wouldn't expect it. Yet Solomon would hav been a wiser and a better man if he had performed his share of the world's work, and earned his board and clothes by the sweat of his brow, instead of lolling about in regal splendor, with slaves to do his bidding. Absorbed in some honest and honorable employment wherewith to help our common humanity, he would never hav uttered the absurd sentence, "Vanity of vanities—all is vanity."

Lastly, dress as comfortably and neatly as your means will permit, and aim to keep the clothing of your mind, as well as your body, clean, handsome, complete, and wholesome. Thus will you be entitled to the respect not only of yourself, but of all around you.

A King's First Earnings.

King Victor Emmanuel of Italy was in his youth a keen sportsman and a fine shot. One day, having wandered away from his party, he was returning by an isolated road from a hunting expedition. He espied a covey of partridges in a copse near by, and, raising his fowling-piece, he killed a brace at a shot.

A peasant who had been watching him attentivly now hurriedly crossed the road and, hailing him, said:

"That was well done. Whoever you are, you know how to handle a gun."

"I'm glad you think so," responded the king, laughing.

"I only wish you could shoot a fox who is robbing me, one by one, of all the fowls in my barnyard."

"Well, perhaps I can. I'll see what I can do for you."

"If you kill that fox," said the peasant impressivly, "I'll giv you two lira."

"Very well. I'll bring my dogs and be here to-morrow."

"Will you giv me your hand on it?" said the farmer, extending his horny digits.

The king gave him his hand and was punctual to the hour appointed on the following day. The fox was on hand, too, but King Victor's sure aim brought Reynard's career to a sudden end.

His majesty hastened to the farmer with his prize.

"See!" he called out, "now you owe me two lira."

"You shall hav it. You've earned it," answered the delighted farmer cordially.

The king looked curiously at the coins as they were handed to him. "Only to think," he muttered to himself, "that this is the first money I ever earned."

On the following day the peasant's wife received a present of a gown, a necklace, and a pair of earrings. Then it was that the farmer learned who it was he had hired to kill his fox.

The Term "Boycott."

The origin of the term "boycotting" was as follows: A Captain Boycott was the agent of a land owner in Ireland. His policy proved to be distasteful and offensiv to the tenants, and such was their feeling in the matter that they asked the landlord to remove him. This was refused, and in retaliation the tenants and their friends refused to work for or under Boycott. They would not harvest his crops, and they made an agreement among themselvs that none of them or theirs should assist or work for him in the harvest. His crops were endangered, when relief arrived in the persons of certain Ulster men, who, under the protection of troops, harvested the crops of Boycott. The defensiv league of the tenantry was much more powerful and effectiv than might be supposed from the single instance of the combination referred to above. The ramifications of their compact were very numerous and extensiv. For example, if anyone had dealings with Boycott or those who represented him, then no one was to hav any dealings with that person. If a man worked for Boycott he was looked upon by his old friends and neighbors as a stranger—no one would sell to or buy of him, no one was to know him. The effect of this agreement when carried to this extent was just what its authors proposed, and "boycotting" has become a very forcible phrase.

What He Did.

One would say that Shakspere, at least, must be the one exceptional prophet to be honored in his own country, but, widely spread as we know his fame to be, at least one Englishman had no very clear idea of its cause.

Some years ago, while passing through Stratford-on-Avon, Mr. Toole, the English comedian, saw a rustic sitting on a fence.

"That is Shakspere's house, isn't it?" he asked, pointing to the building.

"Yes."

"Ever been there?"

"No."

"Brought up here?"

"Yes."

"Did he write anything?"

"Oh yes, he writ."

"What was it?"

"Well," said the rustic, "I think he writ for the Bible."

Correspondence.

KIOWA, COL., June 27, 1890.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: As all the boys and girls seem to be writing to the Corner, I thought I would contribute my mite. I would like to correspond with readers of the Corner. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about four years; we think it quite a paper all through, especially the Children's Corner. Oh, yes; hurrah for Walter W. Clark! That was pretty rich. Miss Mary Foster did pretty well, too. She is getting rather hard on him; instead of going to Himmel he is going to Helena—that is a hard hit. I suppose he can hardly answer that, but he can try awfully hard, I guess. I will close for this time. Ever yours,

WALTER PAGE.

P.S.—Why not hav an exchange column in the Corner? Let others speak on this question. W. P.

TOURTELOTTE, COL., July 5, 1890.

DEAR AUNT SUSAN: I now take my pen in hand to write a children's letter, hoping to find you all well as it leaves us at present. This is my first letter to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and if I see my letter published I will try again. I hav written letters to the Plaindealer and to the Boston Investigator. I suppose all the children of the Corner had a good time on the Fourth of July, on that grand day on which our fathers George Washington and Thomas Paine should ever be remembered. This time in 1889 I was in Missouri just getting over the Fourth. But this time I am in Colorado on the Rocky mountains, and it is "a rocky road to Dublin." But the mountains are beautiful in the springtime. You can look over mountains over mountains. I hav not been in Colorado a year yet. I suppose you hav seen some of my letters in the Plaindealer. It is so hot here that it will make one lazy, but it is nice and cool at night. I can hav snowballs yet. This is the first Fourth of July I threw a snowball. We hav loads of wild flowers now. We are living in Tourtelotte Park, and it is a park. It is either mud or dust—there are no sidewalks here. We hav three saloons, one school-house, four stores. No churches up here, but there are enough down town to make up for it. I lived in Aspen eight months, and it a very pretty place. I am sixteen in March. I do not go to school, but my brother Horace goes to school. He studies reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, and geography. He will be thirteen next February. There are only twenty-one going to school here. I will bring my letter to a close, as it is getting long. So no more.

From your friends,

RHODA AND HORACE MASON.

[Thanks for the pretty wild flowers. We hope you will write again —ED. C. C.]

A LITTLE West End girl who was being scolded by her mother about something which she denied having done finally drew herself up with great dignity and remarked: "Well, mamma, I know nothing whatever about it and care less."

A QUEER little boy who had been to school,
And was up to all sorts of tricks,
Discovered that 9, when upside down,
Would pass for the figure 6.

So when asked his age by a good old dame,
The comical youngster said,
"I'm 9 when I stand on my feet like this,
But 6 when I stand on my head!"

Science and Progress.

A SIMPLE PROCESS FOR CONVERTING A KNIFE BLADE INTO A PERMANENT MAGNET.

Take a pair of iron tongs and a knife, and holding them clasped and upright, rub the knife blade briskly with the end of the tongs, taking care to rub only in one direction—toward the point of the knife. When the point is reached the tongs must be lifted back toward the handle and the motion repeated. The knife should be occasionally turned over so that the friction may be applied to both sides. In about a minute the knife blade will be found to be magnetic, and capable of supporting a needle or steel pen, and the magnetism is quite permanent. The point of the blade corresponds to the north pole of the magnet. Popular Science News, which is authority for the foregoing directions, says the cause of this phenomenon is not quite clear, and is worthy of further investigation.

A NEW SMOKE-CONSUMING APPARATUS.

An English exchange calls attention to a recently invented and patented apparatus for the combustion of smoke in ordinary furnaces. It consists of an arrangement of brickwork channels placed underneath the boiler. Near the first bridge there is a ventilating door, which can be opened or closed at will. The apparatus is connected with a second bridge, or air chamber, where the air is heated to over 400° in passing. The hot air causes complete combustion. It is contended that three advantages are gained by the invention. In the first place the fuel generates more steam, and in the second there is a great saving of fuel. The gases which ordinarly pass up the chimney into the atmosphere are ignited and consumed, so that less fuel has to be used. The third, and by no means the least, advantage gained by the use of the apparatus is the reduction of the smoke nuisance to a minimum.

IRONING BY ELECTRICITY.

And now comes the report from St. Paul of the successful application of electricity to heating the iron rolls of a laundry. It is claimed that this method givs an economy, by meter measurement, of more than 25 per cent over that of gas at $1.25 per thousand, as formerly used for this purpose. The Stationary Engineer explains that the device by which the heating effects are obtained consists of German silver wire wound on a cylinder of asbestos paper which slips inside the iron roll. The current is obtained from the commercial lighting circuit, and is paid for at the same rates and under the same conditions as that used for lighting, the current passing through a meter.

IS ELECTRICITY MANUFACTURED?

The question whether or not electricity is manufactured is now being tried in certain courts. If it is manufactured, the producers in numerous states are liable to taxation. Beniamin Franklin held that electricity was not manufactured, but was taken from one body to be delivered to another, and that practically nothing was lost in the transaction. Hitherto, says the Industrial World, our scientific men hav held this to be true in a broad sense.

A GREAT GOLDEN VESSEL FOUR CENTURIES OLD.

The temple of Buddha, in Ceylon, contains one of the most famous of the world's collections of treasures, and unique among the many rare things found there is a curious golden watering pot, used by the priests, and which plays an important part in the sacred rites.

The Philadelphia Record says that the vessel is known to be over four centuries old, and is one of the most valuable jars in the world, being worth much more in the open market than even the celebrated peachblow vase of which so much was said a few years ago. The metal and the gems in the "Kendiya" are appraised at $36,000.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

The train was left unguided for a long run, and would hav been wrecked at the first unturned switch, when the trainmen, suspecting something wrong from the train's passing stations, climbed ahead and overpowered the madman.

Parliament has given electric companies right to erect poles and wires on buildings against owners' consent, and enter at any time to inspect or repair them. Bradlaugh opposed, pointing out that in America it was not allowable to attach wires to property without the owner's permission, and warning Parliament that they were authorizing confiscation of property rights without compensation.

Declarations by London men of note being adduced against him, he has written to London and obtained proof that these declarations were never made. John Burns writes that short hours decreases demand for drink and increases request for libraries and the like.

A neutral state of feeling [Epicurus taught] is necessarily imperiled by a greedy pursuit of pleasures; hence the dictum, to be content with little is a great good; because little is most easily obtained. The regulation of the desires is therefore of high moment. According to Epicurus, desires fall into three grades. Some are natural and necessary, such as desire of drink, food, or life, and are easily gratified. But when the uneasiness of a want is removed, the bodily pleasures admit of no further increase; anything additional only varies the pleasure. Hence the luxuries which go beyond the relief of our wants are thoroughly superfluous; and the desires arising from them (forming the second grade) though natural, are not necessary. A third class of desires is neither natural nor necessary, but begotten of vain opinion; such as the thirst for civic honors, or for power over others; those desires are the most difficult to gratify, and even if gratified, entail upon us trouble, anxiety, and peril. Epicurus did not, however, deprecate positiv pleasure. If it could be reached without pain, and did not result in pain, it was a pure good; and, even if it could not be had without pain, the question was still open, whether it might not be well worth the price. But in estimating the worth of pleasure, the absence of any accompanying pain should weigh heavily in the balance. . . . A man could not be happy until he had surmounted the fear of death and the fear of gods instilled by the current fables, which disturbed all tranquillity of mind; until he had banished those factitious desires that pushed him into contention for wealth, power, or celebrity; nor unless he behaved with justice to all, and with activ devoted friendship toward a few. Such a mental condition, which Epicurus thought it was in every man's power to acquire by appropriate teaching and companionship, constituted virtue; and was the sure as well as the only precursor of genuin happiness. A mind thus undisturbed and purified was sufficient to itself. The mere satisfaction of the wants of life, and the conversation of friends, became then felt pleasures; if more could be had without preponderant mischief, so much the better; but nature, disburthened of her corruptions and prejudices, required no more to be happy. This at least was as much as the conditions of humanity admitted: a tranquil, undisturbed, innocuous, noncompetitiv fruition.—Bain's Moral Science.

Notes and Clippings.

MRS. IRA L. LIKES, of Hayes City, Neb., has the reputation of being one of the smartest lawyers in the state. She is only twenty-nine years old, but she has been an enthusiastic law student ever since she was seventeen years of age.

A CONGO nativ who has been taught to read and write, has just sent a letter, his first, to the archbishop of Canterbury. It is as follows: "Great and Good Chief of the Tribe of Christ, Greeting: The humblest of your servants kisses the hem of your garment, and begs you to send to his fellow-servants more gospel and less rum."

COL. ELLIOTT FEEFAWFUM SHEPARD added to his usual scripture quotation yesterday a series of elegant extracts from the works of the Hon. Henry Wanderwit Blair. The king of the cranks, says the Sun, will not relish the juxtaposition. He is jealous of the Bible, and to say the truth, it does not contain nearly as many words as one of his speeches.

FOR several years the local bands hav given weekly open-air concerts at Seaside and Washington parks, at Bridgeport, Conn., on Wednesday and Saturday evenings. It is now proposed by the Wheeler Wilson band to giv Sunday afternoon concerts at Seaside park, and such a concert is announced for next Sunday. Business men and working people are largely in favor of these concerts, but at the morning prayer-meeting on Saturday, of church people, a resolution was adopted protesting against a profanation of the Sabbath, and agreeing to use all means within their power to prevent the concerts from being given.

CAPTAIN BRIDGE, of the British navy, who is said to hav visited more islands of the Southern Pacific than any other man, remarks that in all his travels he never saw a cannibal who was not ashamed of the practice, except on the island of New Britain. They are cannibals of another sort, evidently, who told Coquilhat in Central Africa that the nobler the animal the better the food, and they could conceive of no finer aliment than human flesh.

FROM Saratoga comes a story of trouble between the Roman Catholic priest and the electric light company at Schuylerville. Under legal powers, the latter were about erecting a pole opposit the Catholic church, but the priest objected and opposed the company's men by physical force. It is nothing new for the Catholics to object to enlightenment, comments Secular Thought, but in this case there is an idea that it may be necessary to call out the soldiery to protect the workmen.

AT the meeting of the Chicago American Secular Union on Sunday, July 6th, the following was unanimously adopted: "Whereas, During the past year prize fights hav been of frequent occurrence in this city and throughout the country; now, therefore, we, the 'Seculars,' in public meeting assembled at the Princess Opera House, Chicago, this (Sunday) evening, do emphatically denounce the same as injurious to good morals and inconsistent with the spirit of the age, and that we call upon all law-abiding people to assist in discouraging this vice which has disgraced the American people."

"I NOTICED a queer thing recently in Philadelphia," said a New York man the other day. "It was Sunday, and all the street-cars ran as usual except that there were no bells on the horses. They told me that was the law there. They hav to wear bells weekdays, so that people will notice them coming and get out of the way, but Sundays, apparently, it does not make any difference whether folks are run over or not. The proprieties are observed you see, but business is not interfered with."

THE cause of woman's suffrage has received an unexpected impetus in the American Congress. The House committee on the judiciary has reported in favor of proposing an amendment to the Constitution granting it. Minority reports before hav favored it. Thus the present speaker, Mr. Reed, prepared and presented to the forty-sixth Congress the views of the minority; as did Hon. E. B. Taylor in the forty-ninth. But this is the first favorable majority report. There seems to hav been no dissent. The report claims suffrage for woman because otherwise she really has no means of consenting to the government; and the Declaration recites that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." There are twelve million of voting age. No matter if all would not vote; all men do not. This is no reason for unjustly withholding a privilege. They are intellectually qualified, the report recites. Even as rulers of the greatest nations they hav succeeded. There would be less discord at home if they could do part of their talking at the polls. If the polls are not orderly and decent, they would make them so. They go every place else without raising the question of propriety. Their right to acquire and hold separate property has not impaired the domestic relations of married people, but has made women much more useful members of society.

PRINCE BISMARCK, some eighteen years ago, came to the conclusion that women are not to be judged according to a more rigid standard than men. So he instructed the German embassador to turn a deaf ear to what the Montpensiers said about Queen Isabella. All, he contended, that should be required of a female monarch in the way of morality was what men of the world demanded of each other. The duchess de Montpensier's rivalry to her sovereign and sister was based on her own superior virtue. All that rivalry, however, seems now a long way back in the past. Isabella worships her Montpensier grandchildren, who are red-headed imps with, what is rare in Spain, freckled faces. She is now suffered to liv as she likes and talk as she pleases, without giving offense to anybody. There never, perhaps, was a more plainly outspoken tongue than hers. The empress Eugenie used to make a great fuss toward the close of the empire about the hereditary and other antecedents of ladies who wanted to be presented to her. She was apprised one day of the marriage of a certain duke, an ex-assistant to an apothecary, whom, for peace sake, Isabella had ennobled, and was asked to receive the lady. "Who is this duchess?" said Eugenie to her former liege lady. "There's nothing to be objected to in her," said Isabella "she's rich, and I hear that she's the pope's daughter. One cannot go higher than that."

The Christian Church vs. Reason and Justice.

There was one period of twelve hundred years within the historical era, in which justice was ignored and reason branded as a crime. During this period the devotees of science were immured in dungeons, gibbeted on the scaffold, or burnt at the stake alive, by authority of the Christian church; and so completely did ecclesiasticism suppress scientific investigation, and discourage the arts and sciences, that this period of church domination is familiarly known as the "Dark Ages," and the history of barbarism furnishes nothing that will compare with it for tyranny, war, oppression, and wrong, except it be the history of God's chosen people as recorded in the Bible. Those magnificent libraries at Alexandria and Tripoli, containing the scientific and literary wealth of the world, were utterly and wantonly destroyed by the band of Christian vandals, and then it was that the bright era of pagan intelligence was superseded by the long dark night of Christian ignorance and superstition. Dr. Draper informs us that during this period, scientific investigation was branded as a crime, and men in terror burnt their libraries to save themselvs and families from destruction. But then why not? Did not Moses command us by divine authority "not to pity or spare," but to kill even our nearest kinsmen if they suggested a change from the popular religious belief? Paul, after he had propagated the horrid and loathsome doctrins of "original sin," "total depravity," "predestination," and that God loved one child and hated another before either of them was born, and that the Lord sends his children "strong delusions to believe a lie that they might be damned because they believed not the truth"—after propagating these and other doctrins so contrary to the best impulses of our natures, he coolly declares that if anyone else, "even an angel from heaven, should preach any other doctrin, let him be accursed." He warned his followers to "beware that no man spoil you with philosophy." Eusebius, the great church historian of the fourth century, taught that "science is false, and investigation useless." Martin Luther, the father of Protestant Christianity, declared that "Reason was a poisonous beast with many dragon heads—an ugly bride of the devil, and the all-cruelest enemy of God." In his last sermon at Wittenburg, just before his death, he branded reason as "the Great Harlot," "the Devil's Bride," and "Worst seducer of mankind."

Under such leadership, is it to be wondered at that the Christian world retrogressed into a state of ignorance and barbarism, and that Christianity became an inveterate foe to science?

During thirteen hundred years Christianity gave to the world not a single astronomer, chemist, or philosopher; but during that time it produced an Indicopleustes who enlightened the church on geography by representing in his "Cosmas" that the earth was an oblong square inclosed by high walls with upper and lower stories, and that in the upper story angels manipulated a system of water-works, consisting of numerous large cisterns, to regulate the amount of rain on the earth. Then there was Cosmas, another biblical philosopher, who wrote his "Christian Topography" (as he says in his preface) "to denounce the false and heathen doctrins of the rotundity of the earth." He taught in this work, that the "Tabernacle in the wilderness was a correct model of the universe," that the earth was "a rectangular plain four hundred days' journey east and west, and two hundred north and south, from one extremity to the other. This oblong rectangular plain" was, according to this Christian philosopher, "tilted a little to the south, which causes the Euphrates, Tigris, and other rivers running south, to run very rapidly, because they run down hill; while those running north, like the Nile, run more slowly, because they hav to run up hill." These truly scientific treatises received the unqualified sanction of the church authorities, and were approved as standard. In these two so-called scientific writers we hav correct samples of what the church is capable of producing when left to exert her power unrestrained by the modifying and elevating influence of modern Infidelity.

The church during this period also produced some distinguished historians as well as philosophers. Benting, in his "Itinerary of the Holy Scriptures," written on his return from a tour to the Holy Land in 1581, describes the Dead sea as "changing color three times a day." "It spit forth fire, threw up masses like burning pitch, and which, when they fell back, swam about like oxen." Pierra Bilou, on his return to France from a trip to Palestine, also in the seventeenth century, reported that he had "seen the stone on which the disciples slept while Christ prayed;" "the stone on which Christ sat when he raised Lazarus;" "the Lord's footprints in the solid rock at the place where he ascended up to heaven," and also "the stone which the builders rejected." Between Bethlehem and Jerusalem is a field covered with pebbles, which he accounted for as follows: "A peasant was sowing peas on this field, and the Virgin passing by, inquired what he was sowing. He answered pebbles, and his peas were turned to pebbles." Verily a joke on the peasant!

Eugene Roberts was a Christian map-maker of the same century, and in his "Standard Map of Palestine," he designated the exact place where Samson slew the Philistines; where he hid the gates of Gaza; the cave in which Adam and Eve hid after their expulsion; the place where Baalam's ass spoke; the tree on which Absalom hung by the hair; the place where Jacob and God had their famous wrestling match; the exact spot where Elijah started on his journey to heaven in his chariot of fire; where Lot's wife was turned to a pillar of salt, and a point in the sea where the whale swallowed Jonah. He also givs a very interesting and edifying description of the basilisk—an animal eighteen inches long, shaped like a crocodile, and which killed people by a single glance. One of these animals found its way into Rome, and commenced killing people by the score, and in turn was killed by the prayers of the pope. "It is compelled by providence to cry aloud three times when it comes out of its cave, and, by the mercy of God, it is killed by the crowing of the cock." This writer represented that the Church of the Holy Sepulcher was situated exactly at the center of the earth, and that the cross on Calvary occupied the exact spot where once grew the fatal "tree of the knowledge of good and evil." Clement, one of the early fathers, describes the phenix as a veritable bird. Such was the class of writers produced by the church during the Dark Ages, and they set the world back a thousand years in its intellectual march.

Be it remembered that the Christian authorities accepted the above class of fable-writers as the true exponents of philosophy, and approved their false statements and driveling rot as scientific truth. But while it indorsed this class, what was its attitude toward that class of true philosophers who, by observation and experiment, were laboring to discover the grand truths of the universe, and elevate man to higher standards of civilization and enlightenment? We will see. During the fifth century the Christian church suppressed the Greek school of science. Hypatia, the maiden philosopher of Greece, who was the exponent of this school, while on her way to lecture to assembled thousands at the temple of Serapis, was dragged from her chariot in the streets of Alexandria by a Christian mob, forced into an adjoining church, ravished, and brutally murdered, and that, too, by the order of a Christian archbishop.

Roger Bacon was imprisoned fourteen years for the crime of practicing chemistry, and died from the effects of Christian brutality.

Copernicus, at the commencement of the sixteenth century, wrote an astronomical treatis called, "The Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies," and waited thirty-six years before he dared to publish it for fear he would be cremated by the church for doing so. No sooner did this work appear than it was seized by the Christians and burnt, and the author would hav suffered a like fate at their hands had he not died the day after his work was issued from the press, and thus was this malignant ecclesiastical monster cheated out of one victim by the merciful agency of death. Martin Luther, an old brute in human form, called this great Hungarian scientist "a fool and an upstart," and disposed of his grand discoveries by saying, "Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, which he would not hav done if the sun did not move."

Galileo near the close of the sixteenth century invented the telescope, discovered the laws of falling bodies, also the belts across Jupiter and the rings around Saturn, and for the commission of this heinous crime against Christian ignorance and superstition, he was seized, thrown into a prison, and forced to recant and denounce the glorious truths he had discovered, under penalty of being burnt at the stake alive. He was, notwithstanding, incarcerated in a dungeon, and during the remaining ten years of his life was treated with the most remorseless barbarity.

Bruno in the sixteenth century, for the like offense against Christianity of making astronomical discoveries, was burnt alive.

Calvin, the Protestant tyrant at Geneva, burnt at the stake Michael Servetus, the distinguished Spanish physician, because he had the unpardonable effrontery to contend with the old Geneva fiend that it was impossible for a son to be as old as his father. Such was the treatment dealt out to the world's great intellectual and moral heroes by the Christian church during the period of its dominant power, and these Christian barbarities did not cease until the Christian world was compelled to call a halt in its bloody career by such grand old patriots and philanthropists as the immortal Thomas Paine, Jefferson, Franklin, and a host of other noble Infidels of the eighteenth century.

To show with what tenacity the infamous church system adhered to its policy of persecution and cruelty, we will refer to a single instance among hundreds of others of a like character we might mention.

In 1771 Dr. Joseph Priestly, a noted chemist of England, discovered oxygen, the basis of life. In 1791 his house, library, and laboratory was burnt and utterly destroyed by an orthodox Christian mob, and he was forced to flee to America for protection.

Yet in the face of a record of this kind, a record which for outrage, injustice, and cruelty would shame hell itself, modern Christians hav the audacity to claim for their putrid, man-degrading system of religion all the scientific advancement of the age, when in fact they hav been a horrid obstruction in the way of man's intellectual and moral advancement ever since their organization as a religious body.

Gainsville, Ga., July 9, 1890. WARREN SMITH.

A Basket of Bottles.

DAMNED FOR THEIR PARENTS' SIN.

Dr. Legrand du Saule, a celebrated French physician, claims that seventy-five per cent of epileptic children in Paris hospitals are born of intemperate parents.

The best time to let mischief alone is before it is meddled with, and the best time to prevent crime is before the influences occur which will cause its perpetration.

Doubtless not less than seventy-five per cent of all diseases hav the same inception, and all the medical skill in the world has never professed to arrest a like amount. So the liquor-dealer counteracts all the doctors and has a large stock of death left over, and thus ever one man's cupidity is visited upon other people's children.

INFANTIL BANDS BONDS OF INTEMPERANCE.

Correctional, reformatory, and lunatic institutions are in existence and multiplying all over the land.

Their inmates were once babies, who, without a doubt, were dressed with too closely pinned bands that compressed and crowded the stomach and intestins, and made the stomach irritable, calling for something. That "something" was administered, perhaps, by the hand of a loving mother or father, "to stop baby's restlessness." That "something" was an intoxicant that it ever after craved, till, at length, its insatiable appetite led to depravity and a home behind iron bars.

The returns from correctional institutions declare of more than nine-tenths of the inmates "it was rum that brought them here."

Men and women may legislate, crusade, unite, and pray, but not till mothers—women—learn to apply clothing to the bodies of newly born infants in a manner that is safe and healthful, that frees the stomach from abnormal irritations and cravings, will the time come for "temperance to encircle the whole earth."—Mrs. Susan T. Converse in Foote's Health Monthly for May, 1889.

The above statement may seem to some far-fetched, but the logic is legitimate and the facts speak for themselvs. I hav always regarded tight swathing of babies as both uncomfortable and injurious, but hav not before heard from a woman who decidedly declared that infant's belly-bands were bonds of iniquity. Mrs. Converse proves her point, so, mothers, be careful.

WHOSE CRIME?

It is nothing less than a crime for temperance men of New Jersey to defeat the only practical measure which there was a chance that the people would sustain, and to throw the state into the hands of the liquor-sellers.—New York Tribune, August 8th.

This boomerang, aimed at the Prohibitionists, comes back with a vengeance upon the Republicans. How could the state be thrown into the liquor-seller's hands except by the Republican's effort or neglect? The only practical measure is that of the Prohibitionists, and if the people will not sustain that, so much the worse for the people, whoever they are.

SALOONACY.

"You temperance folks are running temperance into the ground," we are often told. I do not know how temperance can be run into the ground—its course is always elevating; but intemperance will surely run men into the earth, or deeper, for its trains all run on the down grade.

Perhaps I shall be by some called a slow scholar for not knowing that temperance should never be carried into politics, for I hav often read it from the quills of befuddled editors, heard it from the campaign stump, reform club platform, and gospel mission, and been kept awake nights hearing drunken men applaud the sentiment to the echo.

The saloon demands all the room there is in politics, but whether it will continue to hav it or not depends upon whether it can keep the people stupefied enough to permit its universal sway.

CHINESE AND CHRISTIAN.

Chinese history tells us that three thousand years ago the art of distillation was discovered in China, but the effect of distilled liquors was found to be so corrupting and demoralizing that distilling was prohibited. The man who had made the discovery was banished to a lonely isle, and there compelled to spend the remainder of his days. (I am afraid that a great many tramps who walk our streets, wondering why they are not as rich as other men, would object to such a law in America.) Thus the art was lost and was not rediscovered until in the eleventh century, when it was again brought into use, this time by the Arabians.

China got along very well without whisky, to begin with, and indeed for three thousand years has maintained the integrity of its government without much war, whilst our Christian countries hav been fighting among themselvs all along, when they were so obfuscated with drink they did not know what their row was all about.

If you say Christian countries are in advance of China in civilization, I ask, Did whisky help them to be so? And again, how much farther might they be advanced had not early Christianity done all it could to block the wheels of progress and beat back the light of the East?

PIETY, POTEEN, AND POTATIES.

Oh! no wonder that we Oirish boys
Are all so free and frisky,
The good Saint Pat, he taught us that,
As well as to drink whisky;
Och! to be sure, he had the knack
And understood distillin',
His mother kept a shebeen shop
Near the town of Enniskillen.

Pity and poteen together hav been too much for the paddies, and that is why they hav to liv on potaties. Except for drink and devotion, the sons of the Green Isle might to-day be as they were before William the Norman, the brightest and most prosperous of the divisions in the now United Kingdom. So long as John Bull keeps sober and sends his head-tangler to his neighboring cattle, he can remain boss of the yard, you know.

APKA SHRAB.

Nativs of India call liquor made and sold by government license, "Apka Shrab," government shame water.

The emir of Bokhara has had it stipulated in a treaty with Russia that liquors are not to be admitted except for the diplats and the eastern community.

In Constantinople liquor saloons are called Christian drinking-places.

Ireland's rentage is twelve and a half million pounds, her drinkage eleven and one-fourth millions, and another large slice for popeage. Alas, poor Ireland! Piety and poteen makes her liv on potatoes.

Rev. John Williams, Wesleyan missionary, says they are not troubled with Infidel literature in West Africa, but floods of rum demoralize the people.

BREAD OR BEER.

Hon. Richard Trevillick, a leader among the Knights of Labor, considers intemperance the curse of organized labor. He says: "The labor question will never be settled until the liquor question is. If the money spent for liquor every year was turned into the labor channels for two years there would not be an idle man in America."

I do not care what scheme of law, government, society, religion, or philosophy you hav, so long as the ideas predominate that liquor is something sacred, that a rum-shop is a holy of holies, that it is better to buy beer than bread, that there is more fun in being a drunken fool than a sober thinker, that it pays for the state to take $1.50 for licensing a business that robs a man of $10 in money, as much more in time, much more in repute and character, and causes an unmeasured amount of crime, society will not be a success, and it will remain a doubtful proposition if life is worth living.

THERE IS BLOOD ON THAT MONEY.

We see no way for a well-informed Catholic conscience to keep a saloon. We wish to God that every Catholic would quit the business. Look around. Take a generation or two. Where does the money made in liquor go? It is better to leave your children without a cent. For there is blood on that saloon money—the heart's blood of insulted, undeservedly despised, neglected, and heart-broken fathers, mothers, wives, and sisters. The guardian angels of the poor dejected orphans hav cursed that money, and the broken-down drunkard has breathed upon it the hell-fire of his own despair.—Cleveland, O., Catholic Universe.

If Catholic teachers would always offer such doctrin as this and ecclesiastics enforce it by their disciplin, the Roman church would be a less reproach to Christendom. Two-thirds of the saloons in this country are kept by Catholics. How largely Peter's Pence is helped out by the profits I don't know. Certainly there can be no worse heresy to humanity, saying nothing of divinity, than intemperance, nor by the Catholic faith can any drunkard inherit the kingdom of heaven. Yet that church damns a man for looking at the stars, but fellowships him in retailing hell-fire.

DIVINITY AND DRUNKENNESS.

The messiah of antinaturalism sanctioned the use of alcoholic drinks by his personal example—nay, by the association of that practice with the rites of a religious sacrament. The habit of purchasing mental exaltation—even to a fever-dream—at the expense of the body, agreed perfectly with the tendencies of a nature-despising fanaticism, and during the long night of the Middle Ages monks and priests vied in an unprecedented excess of alcoholic riots. Nearly every one of the thick-sown convents from Greece to Portugal had a vineyard and a wine-cellar of its own. The monastery of Weltenburg, on the upper Danube, operated the largest brewery of the German empire.—Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

There is much to sustain the supposition that drunkenness had its origin in devotion to the gods. The earliest accounts of worship show wine used as libation to the gods, and it is a relic of this superstition that is seen in the custom of tipplers to spill a portion of their dram before they drink—for luck, they say. But who is luck, unless a god who loves liquor? The almost uniform drunkenness of the pious people of the past goes farther than anything else toward explaining their ferocious persecutions.

HOW TO SAVE SOULS.

Listen to Dr. Helwig's own defense for accepting the Ohio nomination: "And now, my friends, coming to me as this nomination does in this way, I feel myself, and I want you all to feel, that the choosing has been of the Lord. I shall enter upon the campaign with the same seriousness, with the same feeling of deep sincerity and earnestness, as I do in preaching a sermon of the gospel. They say, 'Don't take politics into the pulpit.' I hav no conscientious scruples against a minister entering politics. I thank God that I had backbone enough to take an unequivocal position on this question years ago. I know nothing that will save so many souls as the success of the politics of the Prohibition party. The politics that will close the nine thousand saloons in Ohio and the one hundred and seventy-three thousand breweries, distilleries, and saloons in the United States, will save more souls than hav been saved in this country in the last quarter of a century."—Protest, 1889.

The best way to keep men out of hell is to keep hell out of men, and in no way can men get so much hell into them as by drinking liquors. A temperance gospel will go farther than any other toward saving men from perdition. When the Christian ministers all get the sense and courage to preach and vote political temperance on the principle of practical righteousness, they will be more useful than ornamental. Let our Freethought lecturers take the hint.

HOW TO MAKE CRIMINALS.

Sir Matthew Hale declared, even so long ago as 1670, that eighty per cent of the crimes committed in England were due to drunkenness.

And so it has continued, and so it is in the United States, only more so, as both British and American judges affirm. If eighty per cent of the police power had been exercised to stop the drink business, it would hav been largely subdued, if not quite squelched, whilst direct improvement of morals thereby would hav so toned up society in general that the other twenty per cent would now be much less than it is.

A ROYAL RUM BILL.

Mr. Labouchere states the almost incredible fact that in the accounts of the expenditure of the British sovereign, liquors are set down as costing £9,583; ale and beer, £14,642; wine, £35,888—altogether, £50,113 for intoxicating drinks. So much for the social example of the royal family.

It takes a deal of stimulant to screw the Christian courage up to defend the faith in the divine right of kings, queens, and their jacks. $250,000 is rather a steep rum bill for one poor family, but the dear people who hav it to pay for their kind mistress and her precious children should be congratulated that they do not hav it to drink themselvs. So long as hell-broth has got to be made of good wheat and barley, to keep the farmers from idleness it is well to keep a worthless royal family on hand to consume the cursed stuff. I do not envy the royal majesty any more; it should hav our largest sympathy.

SENATOR INGALLS SAYS IT DOES PROHIBIT.

Kansas has abolished the saloon. The open dram-shop traffic is as extinct as the sale of indulgences. A drunkard is a phenomenon. The bar-keeper has joined the troubadour, the crusader, and the mound-builder. The brewery, the distillery, and the bonded warehouse are known only to the archæologist. It seems incredible that among a population of 1,700,000 people, extending from the Missouri river to Colorado, and from Nebraska to Oklahoma, there is not a place where the thirsty or hilarious wayfarer can enter and, laying down a coin, demand his glass of beer. This does not imply that absolute drouth prevails everywhere, or that "social irrigation" has entirely disappeared. But the habit of drinking is dying out. Temptation being removed from the young and the infirm, they hav been fortified and redeemed. The liquor-seller, being proscribed, is an outlaw, and his vocation disreputable. Drinking, being stigmatized, is out of fashion, and the consumption of intoxicants has enormously decreased. Intelligent and conservativ observers estimate the reduction at ninety per cent; it cannot be less than seventy-five.

Prohibition prohibits. The prediction of its opponents has not been verified; immigration has not been repelled, nor has capital been diverted from the state. The period has been one of unexampled growth and development.—The Forum.

There is one rum lie nailed. Nobody need say again "Prohibition doesn't prohibit." If Freethinkers do not want to wake up some fine morning and find the best work for humanity done while they were dreaming, they need to bestir themselvs and help kill the master curse of man. Don't be copperheads in this war of emancipation.

UNANSWERABLE ARGUMENT.

The statistics of the state of Maine show that twenty years ago nineteen farms of twenty were under mortgage. But now, under twenty years of Prohibition strictly enforced and obeyed all over the state, except in some of the principal cities, only one farm in twenty is mortgaged. That is the best argument ever used for Prohibition.—Boston Investigator.

And is it not a good enough argument? Take off the rum tax and the people can better afford to pay a dozen other taxes. It is the single tax—the rum tax—that is playing hell with the farmers and everybody else in this country. What sense is there in Freethinkers whining that other people pay a hundred-million-dollar gospel tax, while they help to pay, or hav nothing against it to say, a billion-dollar guzzler tax? And an equal amount is lost in the guzzler's time, as much more in crime and courts, as much more in poor-houses, crazy-houses, and prison-houses, whilst the demoralization bill does not come within the rules of arithmetic.

Tyngsboro, Mass. JOHN P. GUILD.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Says Dr. Voelkel in his Free Religious Sunday Paper: "The Dissenters in Austria are entirely without legal rights. They are compelled by law to announce the arrival of their newly born children to one or another of the state-patented religious societies (Evangelical, Catholic, and Jewish), and let them either be baptized or subjected to the Jewish custom of circumcision. Hence Mr. Josef Rösh made his announcement to the synagog. It is a girl; had it been a boy then Mr. Rösh would hav had to let them perform the ancient ceremony evolved from paganism."

Austria must be a paradise for the "elect." And in spite of such evidence as is here given—thousands of more examples might be quoted—there are yet people who calmly allow the church to hav things her own sweet way.

The decision of the police court of Leipzig in the case of "the State versus the Humboldt Freethinker society" has been sustained by the district court. This, however, does not end the matter; the case is already appealed to a higher court. Here there is a good chance for Jehovah to work a miracle—"Let there be light!" It is in this city of Leipzig that Dr. Voelkel was prohibited from lecturing a short while ago on so innocent a subject as the workings of the nervous system, the police authorities declaring that the fact of the doctor being a Free-Religious lecturer was reason enough to render a lecture impossible.

On March 16th last Mr. Edwald E. Vogtherr, a lecturer connected with the Free-Religious Societies, delivered a lecture in Rixdorf, the result of which was three indictments—for blasphemy, for ridicule of the Bible, and for making the church an object of contempt. The local court found Mr. Vogtherr guilty in the second indictment, but declared him "not guilty" in the two others. The case was appealed; and now Berlin's second county court finds him guilty in the third indictment, but not in the others. The sentence was, in each instance, three days' imprisonment, and, considering that death is the reward for offending the emperor, we can but say, Poor Jehovah!

The case is now carried to the supreme court, which probably will find him guilty of blasphemy.

We can but designate the whole proceeding as an immense farce, which disgraces the German courts. Yet what can be expected when men are called upon to convict a person of a crime the nature of which no court can ever fathom?

A German Freethinker living in Russia has donated a large sum of money to the erection of a Baltzar institution, which will accommodate a printing and publishing establishment, bookstore, library, and an Old Folks' Home for ten women or men. The objects of the institution, with which a Baltzar society is connected, are:

1. The publication and distribution of Liberal literature; assistance of studies in the line of free inquiry and in the holding of lectures.

2. Self-development; closer relationship between existing societies and individual members in Germany, as well as with those from foreign countries; publication of a Free-Religious People's Library.

3. Assistance of old and deserving soldiers of the army of Freethought.

The means to realize these objects are to come partly from the endowment fund, partly from yearly self-assessment of the members of the Baltzar Society.

We can but congratulate our German friends on the realization of this grand object, for which we predict a bright future—if they can make the church keep her fingers off. Our English brethren hav a society with objects similar to the Baltzar; but what can we Americans show? Let us go and do likewise.

In Sweden things proceed as usual; that is, the Freethinkers are activ, Viktor E. Lennstrand's health is improving, and the clergy and government are making their fifth attempt to pack a jury that will find Mr. G. Wilhelmson guilty. Mr. Wilhelmson owns a printing establishment; and from it has been issued Lennstrand's famous lecture, "Why I Am Opposed to Christianity."

Since his liberation from prison Mr. Lennstrand has been the recipient of two congratulatory addresses—one from the Freethought Union of France, and one from the Secular Society of England—besides numerous letters from private individuals.

When we became aware of our friend's liberation, we proposed to start a similar address, but, upon second consideration, we gave it up, owing to the fact that in proportion to the size of our country the Liberals, whose signature was desired, were few and far between. Hence we left the matter to each individual, and suppose that many are the congratulatory letters from the United States that hav reached Bryggaregatan 25, Stockholm. GUSTAVE NELSON.

Church Taxation in Washington.

Copy of a letter from the state Secular Union secretary to the attorney-general.

WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION, 2104 SIXTH ST., SEATTLE, WASH., July 7, 1890.

HON. W. C. JONES, Attorney-General state of Washington, Spokane Falls, Dear Sir: As secretary of the Washington Secular Union, I wrote the governor of the state June 26th, calling his attention to the fact that church property, as well as that of private schools and hospitals, liable to taxation by the provisions of our state constitution, was being omitted from the assessment rolls by auditors and assessors throughout the state.

And in accord with article iii, section 5, of the constitution, and an act of the legislature relating to the duties of the governor (recorded on page 64, Session Laws, 1889 and 1890), I urged him to giv instructions to auditors that they must comply with section 62 of an act of the legislature, entitled, "An act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington" (page 628, Session Laws, 1889 and 1890).

Governor Ferry kindly replied:

Your communication of the 26th has been received. The question which you submit to me is one purely of a judicial character, and is one which the executiv of the state has no power to decide.

The construction which you giv to the constitution and to section 1 of the act approved February 25, 1890, is too liberal. If that construction was carried out by me to its logical conclusions I would be clothed with autocratic power.

I hav this day wired the attorney-general for his opinion upon this subject, and when it is received I will forward you a copy. Yours truly, ELISHA P. FERRY.

And on July 1st I received another letter stating:

Attorney-General Jones wires me as follows: Taxation church property governed by old law.

In the Post-Intelligencer of the 4th inst. is published an extract from your opinion, filed on the 3d inst., in regard to exemption from taxation this year of the right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, which opinion giv evidence that you hav changed your mind in regard to taxation of church property being governed by the old law, or, if you hav not, I respectfully call your attention to the fact, that every argument so ably and forcibly adduced by you to prove that exemption of the right of way of the Northern Pacific railroad in this state from taxation ceased with the adoption of our state constitution, applies with even greater force and positivness to all church, private school, and hospital property.

In the opinion referred to you say: "It remains to be seen whether the people by the constitution hav made any such exemption. Section i, article 2, of the constitution, provides as follows: "All property in the state not exempted under the laws of the United States, or under the constitution, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." The foregoing provision of the constitution did not go into effect until we became a state. But that moment the exemption in its charter ceased to be operativ.

Unquestionably your position is well taken, is impregnable, for to exempt any corporation property, civil, commercial, or religious, is repugnant to the letter and spirit of the constitution. You rightly declare that section i, article 2, is peremptory and of immediate effect. But why then is "taxation of church property governed by the old law?" Does not section i, article 2, apply equally to all property in the state, without exception, other than that enumerated in article xxvii, section 2, of the constitution, "provided further that the property of the United States, and of the state, counties, school-districts, and other municipal corporations, and such other property as the legislature may by general law provide, shall be exempt from taxation?"

No church property has been so exempted, but on the contrary the question of exemption of church property was very freely and fully discussed by the framers of the constitution.

The Washington Secular Union was instrumental in furnishing every one of the members of the constitutional convention with pamphlets, cartoons, and documents, proving the gross injustice of all such exemptions.

And after full and exhaustiv discussion of the subject, article i, section 11, was adopted: "No public money or property shall be appropriated for, or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

I appeal to you, would not exemption of any church property from taxation be to appropriate and apply the amount of taxes that should be paid by the owners of said property, to the support of that church or religious establishment? And to clinch the matter beyond all reasonable doubt or controversy, article vii, section 2, declares: "The legislature shall provide by law a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation on all property in the state according to its value in money, and shall prescribe such regulations by general law as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property so that every person and corporation shall pay a tax in proportion of the value of his, her, or its property."

This was the answer of the framers of our state constitution to appeals to continue the exemption of church property from taxation. And the answer was approved by the people of the state of Washington by their overwhelming majority vote, indorsing and ratifying the constitution.

And the legislature, so far from sanctioning a continuance of exemption of church property from taxation, passed "An act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes in the state of Washington [page 606, Session Laws, 1889–1890] in exact harmony with the letter and spirit of the constitution."

Section v of said act, enumerating property that shall be exempt from taxation, rightfully and justly omitted exemption of any church, private school, or hospital property—other than public schools and county hospitals. The law demands all property in the state, every person and corporation owning property, real or personal, shall pay tax. The territorial law exempting church property to the value of $5,000, is repugnant to the just and equitable provisions of the constitution, and by article xxvii, section 2, is made void and of none effect.

All good citizens must fully indorse your very able and logical declaration: "It is incredible that the people of the state of Washington intended, when they adopted the constitution of the state, to exempt the right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company."

And it is even more incredible that they intended to exempt church, private school, or hospital property. You simply announce a well-known and undisputed fact when you say, "The people did not so intend when they voted to adopt that constitution."

Had the territorial law exempted from taxation all persons or corporations engaged in iron works, would there be a shadow of doubt in any sane mind that on the adoption of this constitution all such exemption ceased?

Would it be pretended that the territorial law exempting iron works from taxation held good for another year?

The concluding words of your very ably expressed opinion in regard to state taxation of the right of way of the Northern Pacific railroad could not possibly better express the facts in regard to taxation of church property.

You say, "Nothing but the clearest and most explicit words will suffice to create the exemption contended for." (Will you please to point out, quote, the clear and explicit words that exempt church property from taxation?) "I am therefore of the opinion that the right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, together with all superstructure of every kind erected thereon, is legitimate subject of state taxation, and should be so assessed and taxed this year."

We claim there needed no new machinery of law to make the right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and all church, private school, and hospital property taxable, despite any exemptions under territorial laws.

All such property heretofore exempt, may be listed under the old law, or under the recent act of the legislature, or assessment begun under the old law may be completed under the said act of the legislature, in accord with section 154 (page 664, Session Laws, 1889-90), which provides that all proceedings for the assessment of any tax, or collection of any tax, may be completed pursuant to said act.

But we are confirmed by your opinion filed on the 3d instant, that no matter under which law assessment this year is made, the constitution of the state at its adoption annulled any exemption of right of way of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company or of church property by article vii, section 2, herein before quoted.

The officers and members of the Washington Secular Union respectfully request you to make public your opinion on the following points:

1. Did not the constitution on its adoption by the people, annul and render nugatory the territorial law exempting church property from taxation to the value of $5,000?

2. Did not the act of the legislature in regard to assessment and collection of taxes, herein referred to (page 606, Session Laws, 1889–90), go into effect at the expiration of ninety days from the adjournment of the legislature, to wit, June 26th—and is not said act, and each and all of its provisions, law of the state to-day?

3. If said act is of binding force and effect, then will you cause all auditors and assessors to be notified of that fact, and call their attention to section 62 (page 628, Session Laws, 1889–90): "The county auditor shall carefully examin the assessment books when returned to him by the assessor, and if he discovers that the assessment of any property has been omitted, shall enter the same upon the proper list, and forthwith notify the assessor making such omission, who shall immediately proceed to ascertain the value thereof, and correct the original return; in case of the inability or neglect of the assessor to perform this duty, the auditor shall ascertain the value of such property, and make the necessary corrections?"

4. If auditors or assessors neglect to obey the law, and do not comply with said section 62, in regard to property of churches, private schools, and hospitals, will they not render themselvs liable to the penalties provided by section 145 of said act (page 661, Session Laws, 1889–90)? "Every county auditor and every county assessor who in any case refuses or knowingly neglects to perform any duty enjoined on him by this act, or who consents to, or connives at any evasions of its provisions whereby any proceeding required by this act is prevented or hindered, or whereby any property required to be listed for taxation is unlawfully exempted, or the valuation thereof is entered on the tax list at less than its true value, shall for every such neglect, refusal, consent, or connivance forfeit and pay to the state not less than $200 nor more than $1 000, at the discretion of the court, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction."

5. If there are willful and known omissions of assessment and taxation of church, private school, and hospital property—amounting to millions of dollars of property unassessed and untaxed, in violation of the constitution, and the act of the legislature, would not the proof of such omissions be good and sufficient reason, and defense in any suit, for refusal to pay taxes on other property—since such assessment and taxation is excessiv and illegal, being increased in amount on account of the willful omission of assessors to obey the law and assess church, private, school, and hospital property?

The Washington Secular Union does not attack the rights of the church when insisting upon the just taxation of its property, but simply claims obedience by the church to the constitution and laws of the state, and justice to the people, insisting on equal and exact justice for all, and in this matter is but acting on the admonitions of those distinguished statesmen, Generals U. S. Grant and James A. Garfield.

Trusting your prompt action will avoid appeals to the various county boards of equalization, and prevent the otherwise inevitable fierce contentions and appeals to the courts, awaiting your reply,

Yours truly, C. B. REYNOLDS,
Secretary Washington Secular Union.

Mr. Heywood's Situation.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Thursday, July 24th, at 11 A.M., is fixed for the final disposition of my United States case. As the usual two judges, in cases of appeal, are not allowed us, there is little hope that arguments before Carpenter, alone, will move him to intelligent conclusions. So sentence seems inevitable.

Yours truly, E. H. HEYWOOD.

At the Forks of the Road—An Eternal Parting.

In a recent railroad accident, a family of four persons were instantly killed. The father and son were unbaptized Infidels, but the mother and daughter were baptized believers and belonged to the church. The picture on the first page of this TRUTH SEEKER is intended to convey a faint idea of the parting of that family in the land of shades.

According to the Christian creed, when these departed souls arrived at the forks of the road where the devil's turnpike leads off from the heavenly foot-path, we may naturally suppose that Satan was on the lookout for game and seized on the father and son as his meat, while winged angels swooped down to guide the mother and daughter through the pearly gate into the blissful servitude of heaven. An obedient Christian who is well fortified in the doctrin of hate, as commanded in Luke xiv, 26, might take some pious comfort in a situation like this, but a humane heathen would undoubtedly prefer to believe in the horrible vagaries of an able-bodied nightmare or a harmless Joss rather than this Christian doctrin or a God so pitiless and fiendish as the superannuated individual who is said to be the author of such cruelty as this.

The Cause of Crime.

I clip the following from your issue of 12th inst.:

Chief Crowley of the San Francisco police says that lack of employment is the main cause of prostitution; when the canneries are running there there is a large diminution of arrests for that offense. He thinks that the best remedy for all crime would be some scheme affording all opportunity of work.

When chiefs of police get to thinking want of work the cause of crime, something seems about to break. Why should there be want of work? Is it because there exists a superfluity of all those commodities which work creates? This is incredible, since there are people who resort to crime in order to get food, clothes, shoes, shelter, beer, and tobacco. Is it because material on which to work is lacking? This cannot be, for in most of the trades we hear complaints of a superfluity of such material. "Overproduction," no market, general glut, is the cry of capitalists, at the same time that men resort to robbery and girls to prostitution in order to avert actual starvation. So anomalous a situation as too much wealth of all kinds, inducing crime, beggary, and even famin, was certainly never known until very lately; and according to a man's own temper the paradox must excite either laughter, indignation, or hard thinking. Let us see which appears most suitable.

1. Laughter. If Owlsglass or Swift had told his contemporaries that in 1890 people would be begging, stealing, and starving, because they had grown too rich, the buttons of his hearers would certainly hav suffered. All the facetiæ in "Gulliver's Travels" and the "Praise of Folly" would hav paled their ineffectual fires before such an ineffable absurdity. The nineteenth century is not more stupid than the eighteenth or the fifteenth, that it should receive such bottomless bosh for science. The only reason it does not explode is that the matter is too serious.

2. Indignation should always be kept for the last thing.

3. Hard thinking. What means this overproduction which compels the benevolent capitalists to form trusts, condemn their employees to crime-producing idleness, and tax themselvs for charity's sweet sake? It does not not mean general overproduction, for the only object of producing a surplus is to sell it, the only object of selling one thing is to buy another, the fact that a man wants to sell proves that he wants to buy, and the fact that he wants to buy is proof that he does not get enough of some product or other. It might mean overproduction in a particular line, but the facts are against the idea that such partial overproduction exists. In New York there is said to be actual starvation just now, but in New York within the month the trusts hav been destroying whole shiploads of food. Relativly to the needs of the consumer there is no overproduction. There is overproduction only in relation to the purposes of the capitalists. That the capitalists may realize a profit on their investments their goods must be somewhat scarce. And accordingly the interest of the capitalist, as Adam Smith taught, is hostil to the commonweal. The interest of the community is that prices should be low and wages high. The interest of of the capitalist is that prices should be high and wages low. This being the case, why should the community protect the capitalist in doing what enriches him by impoverishing others? If a poor man should burn a ship to raise wages the police would turn out to stop him. When capitalists destroy a cargo the police turn out to prevent anybody from stopping them. Chief Crowley wants a plan to afford all an opportunity to work. I will suggest a simple plan. Let the police stop assisting capitalists to produce that degree of poverty which is necessary to their profits. Chief Crowley is one of a growing class—the class who talk Anarchism as M. Jourdain talked prose. What they want is somebody to tell them the name of it. C. L. JAMES.

Who Will Answer?

I would like to ask a few questions:

What evidence hav we of any God?

What evidence hav we of immortality?

What authority can one man rightfully hav over another?

How is the rule of a majority any less destructiv to freedom than the rule of a monarch?

What right does man hav to what he does not earn?

What right has any man to hold vacant land out of use?

What right does one man or combination of men hav to monopolize the issue of money?

On what grounds can compulsory taxation be enforced?

Are interest, rent, and profits earned by the receivers?

Can they be collected without force?

What right has a policeman to use force?

What right has any man or body of men to interfere with the absolute individual freedom of the human race? G. A. CHAPIN.

And There Should Be No Bible in the Schools.

From the San Francisco Argonaut.

The first great principle that should be kept steadily in view, and to which all political parties should be compelled to direct their course, is that there is no state religion in the United States, and none is permitted in the general, state, or municipal governments—that there is no God in the Constitution. Religious opinions are free, and religious worship is free within the law, and religious organizations, as such, hav no right to intermeddle or interfere with the administration of political affairs in any part of the United States. Education underlies the entire fabric of our republican government; and in the solemn covenant which givs it a national and recognized existence, it is provided that every citizen within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth shall enjoy unrestricted freedom of religious opinions and their unrestrained expression within the law. Two enemies hav already shown a disposition to interfere with our educational system, viz., foreignism and ecclesiasticism. Roman Catholic aliens would destroy the Americanism of common schools, and ecclesiasticism would rob it of its liberal, progressiv, scientific, and undenominational character. We here reflect the opinions of Mr. Frank M. Bristol in a communication to the Inter Ocean, of Chicago.

The integrity of our common school system is based upon the English language. It is the language in which our Constitution is written and in which our laws are printed. It is the language of our daily life, and while we do not claim that it is better than the German, the French, or the Spanish, it is ours, and because it is ours it is better than any that can be substituted for it. As our flag is more beautiful than any foreign device or emblem because it is ours and associated with our patriotic and loyal traditions, so the English language is connected with our literature, our laws, and dear to us because of its association. We would hav no foreign flag elevated above the starry banner on our soil, or on the decks of our ships, or in any place where our flag should be unfurled. We would hav no foreign language taught in our schools, or spoken in our legislativ halls, or printed in our code of laws, and we would make no treaties in which the English language should not be spoken and printed upon equality with the nation with whom we negotiate; and when any person, priest or layman, professor or school-master, German Lutheran, Scotch Presbyterian, Italian Romanist, Mohammedan, Turk, or Jew, undertakes to dictate the introduction of any foreign tongue into our schools or school-books, we should regard it as the gross and cheeky impertinence of uneducated and vulgar foreignism. It is always the bastard birth of an illicit intercourse between alien ecclesiastics and nativ-born demagogs. It means the destruction of Americanism and the overthrow of our common schools. The sire is an alien clerico, the dam an American mare, the foal a long-eared hybrid, whose intelligence is measured by the music of its mouth. Foreignism is less dangerous than ecclesiasticism. The ecclesiastic is more untiring, more subtle, and is better organized and in all respects better equipped than the demagog or politician. Ecclesiasticism sees and knows that the only thing that its church, or any church, has the right to fear is the kind of education attainable in free American, non-sectarian, common schools, from which the priest, nun, and political demagog are rigorously excluded. The only thing which religious denominations hav any cause to fear is that scientific education which leaves the mind free from all sectarian bias; that education which givs the mind permission to think logically and act upon the logical deductions which arise from the student's own independent reasoning. The American schoolhouse affords no shelter for priest, or nun, or Sunday-school teacher to interpret the sacred writings. There is no portion of the Bible worth teaching which requires denominational interpretation, and any ecclesiastical or priestly interference in the school-room is simple impertinence. Whenever this is permitted our common schools cease to exist, and in their place we would hav Hebrew, Chinese, Roman Catholic, German Lutheran, and Protestant sectarian schools, and all the religions in the world would claim their share of the public moneys in order that their children might be educated in all the absurdities of their particular dogmas; parochial schools would be substituted for our non-sectarian public schools; children of the nineteenth century would be educated as were the occasional pupils who had the opportunity of any education in the fifteenth century—a kind of education which would imprison Galileo and Giordano Bruno, and which, after three centuries, would refuse them a monument; the same kind of education which left the south of Ireland with sixty-five per cent of illiteracy, Italy with eighty per cent, South America with eighty-five per cent. This kind of education would perpetuate political strife and sectional bitterness and keep alive ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, as it has done in Newfoundland, in the province of Quebec, in the kingdom of Spain, in Italy, in parts of France, in Mexico, and in the Central and South American republics. Very many Roman Catholics are true to the country, but the Roman hierarchy is not true and not loyal, nor, in any sense, republican. It does not believe in the power of the people. It is an ecclesiastical tyranny aiming at a complete political despotism, and claiming the divine right of one man, and he old and weak, and Italian, to sway the scepter of universal temporal, civil, and spiritual power. It is not government of the people, by the people, for the people. It is the government of the world by the church and for the church. Destroy the common schools and the priest would be lifted above the school-master, and the people would, in the progress of time, be reduced to the peonage, bondage, and slavery that always attend ignorance under the dominion of priestcraft. Of the article from which we hav most fully drawn our argument, we giv the peroration:

"From ocean to ocean, let the freeman's cry be heard: 'Millions, millions for the common schools, but not one cent for denominational substitutes.' The common school will endure with our liberties, our liberties with the common school. If there must come the issue between the enemies and the friends of popular education, let it come. While we dread the conflict, we do not fear the results. The scepter of oppression is broken, the will of the people is supreme. The face of the age is sunward. The stride of the republic quickens toward the splendors of the perfect day. It has been said—the spirit of our ancestry has said it; the noblest heroism of the past has said it; our twelve millions of school-children hav said it; the freest and most enlightened press of the world has said it; the great, honest, patriotic heart of the people has said it, with a voice like the waves that beat against these shores of freedom; a mighty and triumphant Americanism has said: 'The common school, with law-protected liberty, shall forever stand.'"

News of the Sunday Observance Struggle.

From the Pearl of Days, Organ of the American Sabbath Union.

The Staten Island police raided two museum shows that were giving exhibitions on South Beach, Sunday night, July 6th.

The first of Sunday baseball games at Rocky Point, R. I., was scheduled for July 6th, between the Athletics of Olneyville and the Wanskucks, both of the state league. Four thousand people were present. Col. Amasa Sprague, sheriff of the county, would not allow the players to go upon the field, threatening to arrest them and prosecute the managers of the resort if the game was started.

The National Commissioners of the Columbian World's Exposition held their first formal meeting two weeks ago in Chicago. It was announced at this preliminary meeting that the North American Turners' Society was on hand with four requests of the World's Fair committee: First, to employ only union men; second, to allow only eight hours' work; third, to open the Exposition seven days of the week; fourth, to allow the sale of liquors of every description.

The American Sabbath Union is represented on the Pacific coast in the form of a monthly publication, edited by the Rev. Dr. Edward Thompson, an energetic and successful district secretary of the Union. We are glad to welcome this new ally in the important work of disseminating Sabbath literature. The following article, taken from a recent number of Dr. Thompson's journal, will show under what difficulties the friends of the Sabbath labor in their heroic efforts to secure a Sunday law for California:

"We find many opposed to this movement in California. First we may name the Infidels, who are more numerous here in proportion to the population than in any state in the Union. As soon as it became known that an effort would be made to replace the Sunday law on the statutes of the state, a convention was called of 'Spiritualists, Deists, Materialists, Liberal Christians, Agnostics,' etc., to form a 'union in opposition to the American Sabbath Union, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and kindred organizations."

The convention met in Irving Hall, San Francisco, raised a large sum for campaign purposes, and has ever since been circulating its literature and speaking through its orators all over the state.

"The next class of the Sunday opposers is the Seventh Day Adventist denomination, which has been growing very rapidly in this state for some years past, and is the most aggressiv of all our foes. They are largely a religious people, and they recognize the importance to man of a day of rest and thought and worship, but because we do not fix upon their day they wage war upon the movement.

"The old Californians, with a few exceptions, are opposed to Sunday legislation. California has been so well worked by the opposition that neither of the two great parties will probably espouse our cause. It is an unpopular agitation, and we shall hav to pull hard against the political waves. We believe now is the time for all good men of all parties and all creeds to combine on those state senators and members of the lower house who shall favor the Sunday law, and vote solidly against those who will not, no matter if they belong to their favorit party. That is the only way in which we can secure a Sunday law for our state. Till the good people unite and make a strong sentiment for the Sunday law, the secular press will not help us. Generally it says nothing, pro or con, for fear of displeasing some patron, for heavy advertising often comes from the opposition."

Science.

From the Jury.

Amid the din and confusion of doubting millions wrangling over doctrins, standards, and ancient theories, science stands to-day in calm and majestic grandeur, the safeguard and refuge of mankind. Crowned with the diadem of truth, clothed in the golden robe of reason, it carries in its hand the written experience of the ages. Its field of action is the universe, its pathways through the soundless deeps of eternal space, amid which revolve the myriad worlds. It has rescued man from the thraldom of superstition, the curse of ignorance, and the iron hand of kingly and priestly tyranny, clothed him in his right mind that he may behold the glories of the creativ power, and with an intelligent and unbiased mind search out the truths of unchanging and eternal law. It imparts to its votaries knowledge gained by experience, truths gathered under the guidance of reason; demonstrates its discoveries and puts them to practical use. It places no barriers upon human thought and imprisons none within the gloomy walls of dogmatism. It demands exact weight and measure, perfect justice, and perfect, unadulterated truth. If it enters the quagmire it is to reach the verdure and the mountain beyond. It is fearless in its march, makes no concessions, asks no favors. It demands obedience to divine law, which is natural law. It demonstrates the value of virtue, truth, and honorable deeds. It has harnessed the lightning and placed a girdle around the world; it is strangling disease, turning deserts into gardens, and in countless ways lifting man into a higher plane of life. It has looked even "beyond the veil," and to its searching glance, and listening, patient ear, there has come a response to satisfy the heart yearnings of the race.

The keys of every door in the universe are in the hands of science.

Upon this dying era's grim
Retiring trace
Is sketched by love, in outline dim,
The future's face.

The Writings of the New Testament.

Translated by Gustave Nelson.

What are the real facts in regard to the authenticity of the writings contained in the New Testament? Are they genuin productions written by the men whose names they bear?

During a period of one hundred and forty years several attacks hav been made upon the authenticity of the New Testament, partly because the books were not written by the persons claimed to be their respectiv authors, and partly owing to the fact that these writings exist no longer in their original form. The attacks begin at the time of the Reformation, for Luther himself speaks rather unfavorably of the epistle of James, and denies that Revelation was a work of John. But it is from the middle of the last century only that we can speak of genuin Bible criticism appearing, and it has been kept up until the present time.

The first and, perhaps, most renowned of biblical critics is David Michaelis, who for forty-six years was professor in Göttingen, and taught in his "Introduction to the Divine Writings of the New Covenant" (Göttingen, 1788) that the epistles to the Hebrews, those of James and Jude, and Revelation cannot be regarded as genuin and canonical.

Johann Salome Semler prepared the way for the Rationalistic movement of his time by his work, "Guide to a Free Interpretation of the New Testament," published in 1757. In this work he denies the authenticity of several books, among others Revelation and the epistle to the Hebrews. Of 2 Corinthians he makes three separate epistles.

Gottfried Eichhorn, 1804–1827, professor in Göttingen, in his "Introduction to the New Testament," and Grisson, 1804–1805, entertains doubt as to the genuinness of the gospel of Luke, the two last chapters of Romans, 1 and 2 Peter, the epistles to Timothy 1 and 2, and the epistle to Titus.

Christian Schmidt, in 1804, identified himself by his "Historio-Critical introduction to the New Testament," published in 1828, with the school of Semler. He denied the authenticity of 2 Peter and 1 Timothy, chapters first and second of Luke, and had doubts of 2 Thessalonians.

Leonhard Bertholdt, in his "Historico-Critical Introduction to the New Testament's Writings," doubted, like Ullmann and Ilhausen, the genuinness of 2 Peter; still, like both these professors, he did not entirely reject it.

In Wilhelm Martin Leberecht De Wette's "Text-Book in Historico-Critical Introduction to the Writings of the New Testament," 1818, 1826, 1830, 1834, 1842, 1848, this famous and learned professor from Basel, who was so conscientious an expounder of the Bible in his beautiful translations, and so rich in orthodox material, even he adheres to those learned theologians who hav expressed the greatest doubt about the canonical books. He doubted the authenticity of Matthew, Luke, the Acts, 1 and 2 Peter, Hebrew, Timothy, Ephesians, and Revelation.

Ferdinand Guericke in his "Contributions to the Historico-Critical Introduction to the New Testament" (Halle, 1828; Leipzig, 1843) doubted the genuinness of 2 Peter, but in his "Complete History of the New Testament" (Leipzig, 1854) he withdraws his objections.

August Schott in his "Introduction," 1830, doubted Revelation, Mark xvi, 8–20, Timothy, and Titus, which latter two he attributes to Luke.

August Credner in his "Introduction," published in Halle in 1836, follows Prof. De Wette and denies the authenticity of Mark, 1 and 2 Timothy, Revelation, and 2 Peter.

Gottlieb Neudecker, who in 1840 published in Leipzig his "Historico-Critical Introductory Text-book," followed Credner and disputed the genuinness of Matthew, Mark, 2 Peter, and the epistle to the Hebrews, which he considered as the work of an Alexandrian Jew-Christian versed in the philosophy of Philo.

Edward Reuss, professor in theology in Strasburg, who, in 1854, published in Braunschweig "The History of the Sacred Writings," the first edition of which appeared in Halle, 1842, had already in 1840 published an "Introduction to the Gospel of St. John." This so-called gospel of Matthew is, according to him, a part of an ancient Hebrew writing which contained the story, but not the particulars of the same, which are narrated in the present gospel. Mark is a rewritten edition of the "Gospel of the Ancients," and regarding the so-called gospels of Luke and John, we are not at all sure that these two men wrote them. The account of St. Paul's travels is of another hand from the rest of the Acts, and in the gospel attributed to John there, the words and thoughts put in the mouth of Jesus belong, with regard to form, to the editor of this gospel. The gospel of John, the epistles of James and Paul, contain three mutually contradicting Christian fundamental ideas. The spirit of the epistle to the Hebrews is Jewish-Alexandrian, and its reflections over the death of Jesus are not Pauline. 2 Peter belongs to a later period than that in which Peter lived, and it is impossible to state with certainty how much Peter had to do with the composition of the first epistle named after him. The authorship by John of the first and second epistles is very uncertain; but certain it is that Revelation is not a work of his, but a poetic narrativ of the persecuted church, and it contains the spiritual and material expectations of the synagogs.

Ferdinand Christian Baur, 1845 and 1847, and Schwegler, 1846, both learned men belonging to the new Tübingen school, published "Introductions." To the first-mentioned we owe likewise "Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ," Stuttgart, 1845, and "Critical Investigations of the Canonic Gospels," Tübingen, 1847, while Schwegler wrote, besides his "Introductions," "The Post-Apostolic Age," Tübingen, 1846. These theologians and their followers carried their attacks further than any other of the then existing schools in Germany. In their eyes the gospels were ancient writings of no great importance—yes, only mutually contradicting documents. Both of them rejected Paul's three so-called pastoral epistles and his epistle to the Philippians as belonging to the style of composition found in the writings of the supposed St. John. Schwegler thinks the gospel of John belongs to Montanism.

Baur regarded 1 and 2 Thessalonians and Philemon and the two last chapters of Romans as being doubtful. According to Schwegler the epistle of James was composed in the latter part of the second century, and he denied the genuinness of the epistle of Jude and that to the Hebrews. Both Baur and Schwegler rejected the epistle to the Colossians and believed that 1 Peter was composed in the second century, with the object in view of uniting the followers of Peter and Paul. This school regarded as genuin the epistle to the Romans, except the two last chapters, both epistles to the Corinthians, and the epistle to the Galatians.

Such are the opinions of the leaders in theological criticism in Germany during the last one hundred and forty years. With the exception of the epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, not a single writing exists the genuinness of which has not been attacked in their introductions; and scarcely one among these theologians has not expressed his doubt concerning one or another part of the New Testament.

VIKTOR E. LENNSTRAND.

"God in Our Government."

The above is the title of an article signed, "A. Homrighaus," in a late number of the Observer, a Lutheran organ published in Philadelphia. With the ignorance and conceit so common to religious writers upon the subject, it begins:

Despite all untoward tendencies and the much magnified omission of the recognition of "God" in our Constitution, deep down in the core of our national make-up is lodged the kernel of our Christianity. In proof of this, we essay to cite a few facts, though there be many more. In the Declaration of Independence Mr. Jefferson thrice reverently mentions the creator. This document became the basis of our Constitution. Our government is non-religious, but not irreligious. It is not on parchment, but on hearts, where God delights to see his name engraved. Constantine and the Roman pontiffs had Christ's name emblazoned all over the empire, yet that empire went to pieces. All over the Jewish commonwealth the name of Jehovah was held in such awful adoration that people dared not take that name upon their lips; yet they murdered the prince of peace.

In the constitutional convention of 1787, it was Benjamin Franklin who introduced a motion for daily prayers. That motion carried and prayers were had during all those sessions. At the inauguration of our first president in 1789 the open Bible was kissed. Ceremonies being ended, Washington and the legislators proceeded from the Senate chamber to St. Paul's church (New York), where the chaplain of the Senate conducted divine services. Prayers for the president were said and the Te Deum was sung. We could wish for a return of that custom.

Again, on the sixteenth day of this very month, 1790, just one century ago, when the plan of the present city of Washington was projected, which plan is now on exhibition in the lecture hall of the National Museum, provision was made for the assignment to each religious body of a parcel of land upon which places of worship might be erected. That the Lutheran church was not so remembered is owing to the fact that then we had no existence in this city. The year 1833 shows our first organization. Another plot of ground was set aside by Congress for the construction of a national church building, which "should be used on all occasions for Thanksgiving services, funeral orations, and other purposes." It was to be assigned, however, to no "particular sect," but equally accessible to all denominations. Whether this plan was really carried out I know not. Suffice it to say that in these facts we hav a recognition of God if we hav anything, and this at the very cradle of our national existence. To hav ushered our nation into life without God would hav meant extinction. The Supreme Court, too, has repeatedly recognized our religion as the Christian religion. Recognition of God is manifested in every annual presidential Thanksgiving proclamation. Prayer opens the two Houses of Congress every day.

This is made up of an attempt to prove that "in the care of our national life is lodged the kernel of our Christianity." In regard to the acknowledgment of the deity in the Declaration, we would say that the author of that grand document was not a Christian, but a Deist, and reference to the Christian religion is nowhere to be found therein. The Declaration was merely an avowal by the colonies that they were free and independent from England, and even if the "kernel of our Christianity" were found to be there, it was afterward superseded by the first amendment to the Constitution, which reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion." Next comes the remarkable statement that "Our government is non-religious, but not irreligious." And "it is not on parchment, but on hearts, where God delights to see his name engraven." Webster defines irreligious as "destitute of religion" and "indicating a want of religion." The Latin prefix non is also used in a negativ sense, and only the ingenuity of a priest can distinguish any difference between them. The fact is, our government tolerates all religions and grants special privileges to none. If it was religious itself it would not do so, but as it is not it is irreligious or non-religious, just as you are pleased to call it.

It seems, however, that if God is written "on hearts," he is still unable to hold his own. His priests at the present day think him securer on parchment than on hearts, and hence they attempt to amend the Constitution to that effect. When Benjamin Franklin introduced a motion for prayers in the constitutional convention that motion was not carried, and "prayers were not held during all those sessions" (see J. S. C. Abbot's "Life of Franklin" and Parton's "Life of Franklin"). The motion was lost by an overwhelming majority, only three or four voting in its favor. Franklin, like Jefferson, was a Deist.

The fact merely that "the legislators proceeded from the Senate chamber to St. Paul's church, where the chaplain of the Senate conducted divine services," no more proves the legality of the act than the fact that certain United States officials just before the war stole government bonds, proves the legality or justice of that act. No doubt the author of this article wishes "for a return of that custom." It would enhance the authority of the priests, and together with a national recognition of Christianity by the Constitution, would make the church practically the ruler of this country.

The granting of land to "each religious body," and the recognition of God in our Thanksgiving proclamations, and the assertion in regard to the Supreme Court, all come under the same head. We know that priestcraft has always been strong in this country, and that it has defied all laws that stood in the way of its plots and schemes. We know that it has insinuated itself into our government, manages to hav its God mentioned in our proclamations, places its Bible in our schools, and moans out its prayers in our halls of Congress. But is this in accordance with the Constitution? Is this therein provided in any manner, directly or indirectly? No, it is done because the church has power enough to override laws, Constitution, and justice. Notwithstanding the fact that the supreme law of the land forbids the recognition of religion, the church and clergy would no more obey that provision one hundred years ago, than it does to-day. Even now, in states where no Sabbath laws are in force, where the Bible is forbidden to be read in schools, and where ecclesiastical property is not exempt from taxation. justice dare not relax its vigilance for a moment. If it does, the church will defy them all.

In our times, when some second-hand statesmen, some pot-house politicians, and some unwashed foreigners, combine to subvert the nation by robbing her of her God, it is truly refreshing to know that the foremost statesmen and rulers, transatlantic and cisatlantic, are still controled by the principles of the book of books. Indeed, a self-governing people is more in need of Bibles than of armies, armaments, and navies.

We will pass by the epithets of "pot-house politicians," "second-hand statesmen," and "unwashed foreigners." The author of these articles is undoubtedly irresponsible for what he says, but men of his type are the very ones who are "combining to subvert the nation." We hav more to fear from those who are trying to connect church and state, than we hav from all the foreigners who emigrate to this country. The foreigners of whom we need hav fears are the scum and slime of Catholic countries, who are like clay in the hands of the pope and the priests, and who are to-day doing more to abolish American institutions than all other influences combined. Freethinkers and Infidels do not wish to change the Constitution. They simply want to leave it as it is. All they are contending for is obedience to it; and all who disobey it, or seek to incorporate Christianity into it, like Blair, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the Catholic church, are traitors to their country, and should be dealt with as such. Eighteen hundred years ago, the devil carried God through the air and placed him on the pinnacle of the temple, and from there to the top of the mountain. To-day, "second-hand statesmen, some pot-house politicians, and some unwashed foreigners" are trying to haul him out of this country. Poor God! Between the two he has been most pitifully "shaken up."

The Revolution of 1776 secured our independence and unsurpassed free institutions. But how came it, we must ask, that these things are true of England and America, whilst the Revolution of 1793 in France utterly failed—yes, settled into blacker darkness than that which it proposed to remove? England could exchange James II. for William III., and America could exchange George III., with his divine right obstinacy, for a free republic, while all that France could do was to put Mirabeau, Danton, and Robespierre in the place of Louis XVI. From that time on it appears that either the devil went to France, or France to the devil. Why, we ask, such different results? Reader, go below the surface. Let the open Bible of England and America, and the rampant Infidelity of France, tell the tale.

The French Revolution a failure! This is news to the modern world. Hear what Buckle says: "The French Revolution is unquestionably the most important, the most complicated, and the most glorious event in history." Von Sybel, in his history of this great conflict, says: "Serfdom, feudal jurisdiction, manorial ground rents, tithes, game laws, saleable offices, clerical fees, robbing dues, municipal and provincial privileges, privileges of rank, exemption from taxes, plurality of offices and livings, were all swept away in one night. Many things the assembly did that night that were of little moment, but there were advantages gained that night that were eternal—freedom of labor, equality before the law, and unity of the state." If the author of this article would "go below the surface," he would not make so many erroneous statements. FRANKLIN STEINER.

The Study of Languages.

"The world is my country, to do good my religion," said a great teacher. But half of the world of European origin does not understand the language in which the sentence is written, and doing good is much limited thereby. It is becoming important to understand foreign languages, for that will enable us to communicate with our Liberal brethren abroad. Among those whose mother tongue is English there are some who are disposed to be illiberal toward other languages. I am so sure that "the law of the least effort" will cause the English to root out all other languages with which it comes in contact that I am perfectly willing to see "a fair field and no favor." A language that has lost its inflections to a great extent, and whose genders are distinctions by sex, must in the struggle for existence beat those that carry a mass of baggage in the way of inflections and that put some feminin beings into the neuter gender, as, for instance, the maiden in German.

If anyone will put in his waste hours studying a language he will be astonished to see how much progress he will make. Why not study languages all one's life? To the English-speaking it is especially gratifying as well as easy, for we find our language interwoven with every language of Europe. English is called a Low German dialect. Lowland and highland, or coast and hill, would convey more clearly the meaning than Low and High, perhaps. The English-speaking person who knows no language but English, cannot know much about that. But let him learn Highland German, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, old and new Icelandic, French, Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese. Then it is as if he stood by a tree and could with his mind's eye penetrate the soil and see where every root grows. There is a deep pleasure in recognizing a word, say, for instance, the word "father," from Sanscrit down to English in a dozen or twenty languages—knowing it as quickly as you see it. One good way to learn a living language is to read the daily news in it.

One humanizing effect of the study of languages is that it forcibly impresses us with the truth of the brotherhood of man, especially of Aryan man. We see that the Aryan tongues all came from some original source. It opens up a vast historical view, and greatly widens one's horizon. To me it is a great pleasure to read the Fritänkaren, of Stockholm, and the Sontags Blate, of Magdeburg. Some of these days we will be having international meetings, and then how pleasant would it be for each delegate to speak in whatever language he feels most familiar with, and be understood by all the others! Instead of chasing foreign languages out of the public schools it might be a good plan to hav each study begun in English and reviewed the next session in some other language.

Mr. Heywood speaks of having changed his name from Hoar because he feared ridicule. Hoar is Swedish for hair. It is printed in Swedish with a small o just over the a. To one who studies the tongues many a curious history is told by proper names as well as by other words. GEO. WILSON.

Our London Letter.

The report of the special commission appointed to investigate the truth of the charges brought against the Wesleyan missionaries in India by Hugh Price Hughes has been made public. It is just such a report as might hav been expected, as it would not do to admit that the missionaries were other than a most self-denying body of men. The commissioners say that the missionaries hav very moderate stipends, and cannot possibly liv extravagantly nor keep up any degree of style, therefore it is resolved that in future, instead of receiving their salaries in gold, they will be paid in silver currency, which will make an average reduction of £60 per annum. There is a decided element of weakness here, for, if they are not overpaid already, why reduce their salaries? If such action be necessary, it clearly proves that they hav been overpaid, and therefore the charge of luxurious living may be considered as proved and admitted. Although the committee passed a resolution expressing its great satisfaction that its Indian missionaries are thus completely exonerated, those who hav personal knowledge as to the actions of these individuals in the East will not hav their opinions altered by any amount of such whitewashing, but if the rich and ignorant subscribers to the missionary fund can be deceived by the report, the desired object will be attained. It was well for the commissioners that the charges were brought by such a man as Hughes, who is not in very good odor, and as he is somewhat notorious for concocting and publishing stories of the conversion of anonymous Infidel leaders, which cannot be sustained on investigation, his statements are held in considerable doubt even when he may speak the truth, and so he will hav to share the ordinary fate of all convicted liars.

An endeavor has been made in Parliament to get the question of religious belief placed on the census paper for next year, but the motion was promptly thrown out, and perhaps it is better that it is so, for unless everyone feels free to state the truth, such a religious census would be entirely misleading. The archbishop of Canterbury opposed the idea, though why he should hav done so is not clear, for there is no doubt thousands of poor householders, more particularly in the country districts, would hav claimed to believe in Episcopacy solely with an eye to future benefit. On the other hand, there is no doubt that many who hav nothing to fear from so doing would enrol themselvs as Freethinkers. Probably the archbishop thinks it would be better not to let it be known too publicly that they are so numerous as he must well know them to be. In the yearly religious statistics given in Whitaker's Almanac under the heading "Freethought," it is estimated there are three millions against one million in 1886, whilst in 1875 there were six million nine hundred thousand of no particular religion. The number swelled year by year until in 1889 they amounted to twelve and one-half millions. As these do not appear to be ascertained quantities, there is but little doubt they are rather under than over estimated, and would total up considerable more if a true return were given, consequently it would not be expedient that this should be given in a government paper, as the influence of such numbers would far outweigh the slight advantage that would accrue from the fancy increase the state church might show.

It appears that the Rev. F. Besant has not gained the love of his children by his arbitrary action toward their mother. Mrs. Besant was able to announce that her son, who has just attained his majority, has elected to be with her, and the daughter of whom she was robbed some few years back is also likely to return as soon as she possibly can. They cannot hav much respect for the religion professed by their father, and it is not at all surprising that they will hav nothing to do with it. Mrs. Besant has the congratulations of all her friends, who cordially wish her a full share of happiness in the love and attention of the children, of whose companionship she has been deprived for so many years. God in the Constitution.

From the New York Sun.

The Reformed Presbyterians refuse to vote because there is no formal recognition of God and the divine sovereignty in the Constitution of the United States. Ten thousand of them accordingly hav signed a petition to Congress urging that the omission be supplied, and their synod, in session here, has adopted a report advising that the sending of such petitions be kept up.

Meantime the Presbyterians proper are considering how they can get the doctrin of God's sovereignty out of their creed, or, at least, how to modify its statement so that it shall be made agreeable to human reason. They are willing to recognize God in their constitution, but they want him to limit his power by the vote of the majority of the presbyteries. They insist that he shall govern after the method of parliamentary restraint, that the divine sovereignty shall be limited, and no longer absolute and without regard to human suffrage.

The Reformed Presbyterians are a comparativly small branch of the great Presbyterian family, and are probably looked upon by the rest as cranky fellows, who carry their uncompromising spirit to an absurd extreme. But they liv up to their convictions and deserve respect in consequence. They do not try to hedge, but accept the conclusions from their doctrins boldly and without evasion. They believe that the only true sovereign in the universe is God and that earthly rulers are his mere creatures, powerless against his will. Hence they declare that a government which does not so proclaim, and act accordingly, is wicked and godless, and to take part in it is sin.

But the main body of the Presbyterians rebel against the theory of the absolute sovereignty of God when it runs counter to their notions of what justice ought to be. They want to profess to believe in an omnipotent and omniscient God, and yet to avoid the necessary conclusion that he has determined unchangeably whatever he brings to pass. They say that there is only one will in the universe, but when their own wills are in opposition to it, they want to devise some way of escaping the inevitable collision.

God, says their creed, is absolute in his sovereignty over every human creature. He has devised a system of rewards and punishments, sending some men and angels to hell, and others to heaven; and logically, continues the Westminster Confession, he, the all-knowing and the all-powerful, must hav known from the beginning what was to be the fate of each creature to be made. That is the doctrin of election, and how can you get rid of it without denying the personality of God, or throwing overboard belief in future reprobation?

But the Presbyterians are trying to get over it. They want a more agreeable doctrin. They want to believe that even if some people are to be damned, God did not foresee and decree their fate from all eternity, though he foresaw and decreed whatsoever was to happen. They recoil from the thought of becoming downright Atheists, yet they would make of God only the expression of their desires, not a personal ruler with mankind as his powerless subjects.

The situation is very remarkable. It seems to us that the first effort of the Presbyterians should be to keep God in their Confession of Faith, rather than to bring it to pass that his sovereignty shall be recognized in the Constitution, a document which has no relation to religion, and lays down the fundamental principles of government for a republic in which the separation of church and state is complete and final.

The Untaxed Churches of Philadelphia.

We are glad to note that here and there the people of the country are awakening to the fact that the exempt-from-taxation property is becoming a burden too onerous to be borne. The proposition to amend the constitution of Maryland so that churches and other non-productiv real estate may pay their share of the cost of the government, has already been noticed. Mr. Reynolds has extendedly told us what the state of Washington is doing. The latest protest against this indirect robbery is from Philadelphia. The evening Item has taken the matter up and publishes a long list of churches, hospitals, charitable institutions, and state and national properties which, by being exempt, increase the taxes which must be paid by the non-exempt property. The question, says the Item, is a serious one, and concerns every citizen proportionately to the amount of money he owns. No one owns so little that he does not feel the increase. The city treasury, adds the Item, needs money and needs it badly. Each year councils agree on the figure which citizens must pay as a tax on their property, to put that money in the city treasury. Each year $84,884,394 of property is passed over and goes untaxed; nay, the amount is daily growing larger. Do not the people who hav other property pay much more than they in proportion ought because of this?

Of this vast amount of untaxed property over twenty millions are in church edifices. The following is a list as compiled by Taggart's Times:

"Methodist Episcopal churches, 124; assessed at $2,714,100.
"Presbyterian churches, 121; assessed at $4,249,500.
"Protestant Episcopal churches, 104; assessed at $3,543,200.
"Baptist churches, 94; assessed at $2,197,500.
"Roman Catholic churches, 86; assessed at $3,866,200.
"Lutheran churches (German Reformed, etc.), 58; assessed at $2,976,100.
"Friends' meeting houses, 19; assessed at $64,000.
"Jewish synagogs, 14; assessed at $419,000.
"Universalist churches, 5; assessed at $127,000.
"Unitarian churches, 3; assessed at $92,000.
"Moravian churches, 3; assessed at $75,000."

This list foots up to $20,323,600. In addition there are sixty-nine churches the value and denomination of which are not given in the assessor's books. In addition there are charitable institutions, which are next door to churches, as follows:

Ward.	No. of Churches.	Assessed value.	Ward.	No. of Churches.	Assessed value.

The large amount in the twenty-ninth ward is chiefly Girard College property, a Secular institution stolen by Jesuitical Protestants.

Considering this matter the Item says: "Churches of every denomination should pay the regular tax. This is not a matter of sentiment, but of business. The people, indirectly, pay the taxes of the churches. The rate of tax they pay on their own property is increased by the exemption of the immense amount of church property. Then those who belong to the smaller denominations, which hav but little property, pay the taxes, together with the rest of the people, on the property of the larger denominations. Again, the non-church-goer pays taxes for the churches in which he has no interest. The Masonic Temple is assessed at $1,000,000 but it is exempt from taxation. Why? It is neither a religious nor a charitable organization. Why do the great mass of people, who are not Masons, pay the taxes on the Masonic Temple?"

We regard it as a very healthy sign that the Secular Union has induced others to consider this matter. Men can be reached by way of their pockets quicker, perhaps, than through their sense of justice. There never was an argument in favor of exempting churches that would bear examination. It is not good public policy; it is against honesty; is wholly unjust. We hope that the Item will not allow the question to disappear from sight, but will follow its good beginning up by agitation which shall compel the legislature to remedy the enormous and enormously increasing evil.

The sub-committee on permanent organization of the World's Fair Commission held its first meeting on July 16th at Philadelphia. Mr. Thomas Cochran, who was chairman of the finance committee of the Centennial Exhibition, gave the committee a general idea of the manner in which the Centennial Exhibition was conducted. In the course of the conversation the question of keeping the Fair open on Sundays arose. On this question the committee was unanimous, all of them expressing the opinion that the exhibition should remain open on Sunday.

We trust that the American Sabbath Union and God-in-the-Constitution people will not fall down in fits when they read this.

History Repeats Itself.

The Christian Advocate complains that it is a waste of time to attempt aggressiv Protestant work in Russia. Not until the whole constitution is changed, it says, can it be effected.

The cause of these discouraging words is that in Wytepsk several men "of the best character" are in the inner secret prison, where they hav been held during the whole of the present year. Their only offense is that they hav tried to spread the "evangelical" teachings of the gospel among their acquaintances. They are now told that they will probably be deprived of their property and rights, and some will be imprisoned as common criminals, and others banished either to Siberia or beyond the Caucasus. Russian law concerning religious teaching, says the Advocate, is in the interest of the orthodox Russo-Greek church. So long as the priests are not interfered with, or proselytes made directly from that church, little disturbance is made; but if their revenues or congregations are interfered with, or their attention attracted in the slightest way, they can put the machinery of persecution in operation.

When the editor of the Advocate wrote that did he stop to think that his description fitted our own country but a comparativly few decades ago? and that it was not the Russo-Greek but the Protestant church which put the machinery of persecution in operation, and made it a waste of time to attempt aggressiv work which interfered with the priests of the Puritan faith? Did he stop to think of the witches hanged on Boston Common, and the Quaker women, naked to the waist, whipped through New England streets by the Puritan Protestants? Did he see by mental vision the banished Baptists and the tortured heretics?

"Giv any orthodox church the power, and to-day they would punish heresy with whip, and chain, and fire. So long as a church deems a certain belief essential to salvation, just so long it will kill and burn if it has the power." The Russo-Greek church deems a belief in its creed essential to salvation, and the evangelical Christians are as truly heretics to that creed as the Quakers were to the creed of the Puritans.

The Confessional.

The Catholic Review copies from the Christian Register, a Unitarian organ, these words of a correspondent:

"The confessional has given the church an immense power over the conduct of its members, which I believe it has used wisely in the interests of female purity. Undoubtedly its female orders hav aided in this good work. Unfortunately, the great body of Protestant young girls are receiving no instruction or friendly counsel on that subject from either minister or mother. Personal purity has been held too delicate a subject for even a mother to allude to, and so the child is left to chance to learn the most sacred things. Let the Protestants gladly admit what the Catholics are doing in that respect, and emulate their example."

This utterance, naturally, pleases the Review. It shows, it says, "that the superiority of the Catholic system is becoming known and appreciated by many outside the church." Then it goes on to inform such idiots as this Unitarian and other Protestants what they must do to emulate the example of the Catholics.

"In the first place, they must be convinced that confession is a sacrament, of divine institution; that it is not only a duty but a privilege—in fact the greatest boon of God to man; that when our Lord said: 'Whose sins ye remit they are remitted unto them, and whose sins ye retain they are retained,' it was not necessary for him to add a command that the people should confess to them, for the necessity of confession is implied in the very power of remitting and retaining sins. For how could they tell what sins to remit and what to retain unless they were confessed with their attendant circumstances? But the penitents must also be convinced that there will be no possibility of their confidence ever being betrayed; that the lips of the confessor will be forever sealed; that they can go with even more confidence to their spiritual than they can to their bodily physician for advice and direction upon the most delicate subjects, and that as the bodily physician is prepared for his very responsible and delicate office by a long course of special scientific training, so should the spiritual physician be prepared for his even more responsible. and if possible, more delicate office, by a thorough training in the science of moral theology, which has reference to the guidance of souls in all the various relations of life. . . . The wisest and holiest among us need spiritual direction, while for the young of both sexes the confessional may be said to be the only real safeguard against the temptations to which they are exposed."

In the breaking up of the Protestant creeds, the evolution from primitiv barbaric theology to an ethical system which shall offer to men rules of conduct for happy guidance, the growth from Christianity to Rationalism, it is inevitable that the conservativ, the fossilized, the one in whose nature linger relics of the past, shall turn to the unprogressiv sect and find therein a haven for its slavish soul. But that a Unitarian, a member of a sect which is supposed to be the highway to heresy—yea, heresy itself—should "cling lovingly to the legends of the bib and rattle" and "crawl back in cribs and ask to hear the rhymes and fables once again," is indeed a surprise. For if there is one thing which we had supposed the decent portion of the world agreed upon it is that the confessional has been the source of more immorality than any other institution which the Romish church adopted from paganism. The confessional has ever been, if our histories are not all false, "the key to open the door of seduction and adultery. The canker of our social life has been the Christian creed, the bandit of our morals has been the Christian priest." Anglicanism is the one sect of Protestantism which has borrowed this corrupting "sacrament," and through its means, says an English writer, Rome has "again asserted her power to whisper her infamies into the ear of the English wife and the English maiden, in order that she may make the English home impure sub rosa, and transform the flower of English womanhood into brazen Phrynes."

Priests, says the Review, receive thorough training in the science of moral theology. If the Review had said *im*moral theology its statement would hav been true. Den's and Liguori's "Moral Theologies" are so utterly *im*moral that they cannot be translated into the English language without subjecting the translator to fine and imprisonment. A few years ago the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER undertook to let the public know just what these books taught the priests. The writer of this was given the task of preparing them for the printer; but he found them so thoroughly rotten that he advised a discontinuance of the work, and the "copy" was burnt, and the plates completed were thrown into the melting-pot. When, some years ago, the Protestant Evangelical Mission of London disseminated such a translation of certain parts of the moral theologies bearing on the confessional, of Dens and Liguori, Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn, in the court of queen's bench, found the book obscene, and it was likewise suppressed. And in a little work by the editor of the Agnostic Journal, W. Stewart Ross, of London, "The Confessional Exposed," the larger portion of the extracts from these two books has to be printed in Latin. At the conclusion of several pages of quotations Mr. Ross says, "Enough! I can wade no further into this Latin filth. Through a breach in the ramparts of Rome I feel I hav the courage to rush, unhesitatingly, against the spears of all her Gods or the curses of all her flamens. But Rome has nonplussed me this time; in the breach she has put a dunghill, reeking with defecation, cataplasmal with offal." How books of which this is a correct description can teach morality is one of those things which Jesuitism alone can explain. And if moral theology as taught by Rome is a safeguard against the temptations to which youth is exposed, what would be an immoral theology which is no safeguard at all?

The confessional was established as an essential part of church disciplin at the fourth Lateran Council in 1215 A.D., though the practice is older. It was a superstitious growth from Jewish and pagan beginnings, adopted authoritativly by Rome under Innocent III. to increase ecclesiastical power. From that date, says the writer previously referred to, till the hammer of Luther sounded on the church door at Wittenburg, Lust and Rapacity had it all their own way. It is a disagreeable subject, and one which we would like to pass by in silence, but when, in these days, Unitarian writers are found advocating its adoption by Protestant sects, it seems imperativ to recall its disastrous consequences when enforced by the priests of the Romish church. To do this it is necessary to use but a fraction, and that not the most vulgar fraction, of the facts cited by Saladin in his exposé of the infamous sacrament.

The confessional was the nexus between the monastery and the convent. "The nuns were, by the questionings of the confessor, familiarized with the most secret sins of the celibate priest's libidinous heart. Sexual amours are not safe topics for conversation between man and woman. The prurient suggestivness of a wily confessor would be, generally, enough to leave the unhappy 'Bride of Christ' with the burden of her dishonored person and her broken vows." The women inside the convents and the women outside them were the prey of the priests. D'Aubigne in his "History of the Reformation" says: "In many places the people were delighted at seeing a priest keep a mistress, that the married women might be safe from his seductions. . . . Corneille Adrian at Bruges, the Abbot Trinkler at Capel, imitated the manners of the east, and had their harems. . . . In many places the priest paid the bishop a regular tax for the woman with whom he lived, and for each child he had by her. A German bishop said publicly one day, at a great entertainment, that, in one year, eleven thousand priests had presented themselvs before him for that purpose. . . . Rodrigo Borgia, after having lived with a Roman lady, had continued the same illicit connection with one of her daughters, named Rose Vanozza, by whom he had five children. He was a cardinal and archbishop, living at Rome with Vanozza and other women . . . when the death of Innocent VIII. created a vacancy in the pontifical chair. He succeeded in obtaining it by bribing each cardinal at a stipulated price. . . . Borgia became pope under the name of Alexander VI. . . . He celebrated in the Vatican the marriage of his daughter, Lucretia, by festivities, at which his mistress, Julia Bella, was present, and which was enlivened by licentious plays. . . . All the clergy kept mistresses, and all the convents of the capital [Rome] were houses of ill fame."

The licentiousness of the clergy, says Erasmus, "has debauched and turned into poor profligates one hundred thousand women in England." "Yet who is he, though he be never so much aggrieved, who dare lay to their charge, by any action at law, even the leading astray of a wife or daughter? If he do, he is by and by accused of heresy," and the Inquisition knew how to punish heresy. One of the commissioners of the report to Parliament, in 1563, at the instigation of Henry VIII., writes as follows of the English monasteries: "There were found in them, not seven, but more than seven hundred thousand deadly sins. Alack, my heart maketh all my members to tremble when I remember the abominations that were there tryed out. O Lord God! what canst thou answer to the Cities of the Plain confounded with celestial fire, when they shall allege before thee the iniquities of those religions which thou hast so long supported? . . . Truly, the monstrous lives of monks, friars, and nuns hav destroyed their monasteries and churches, and not we." "The commissioners," writes Burnet, "found great factions in the houses, and barbarous cruelties exercised by one faction against another, as either of them prevailed. . . . But for the lewdness of the confessors of nunneries, and the great corruption of that state, whole convents being found almost all with child; for the dissoluteness of abbots, and the other monks and friars, not only with harlots, but married women, and for their unnatural lusts and other brutish practices . . . are not fit to be spoken of."

It is claimed, and undoubtedly with ample reason, that the making it compulsory for women to confess to the priest had much to do with their seduction and the fearful state of morals which obtained. It is stated by Llorente the historian that in Spain, so great was the outcry against the immoralities of the priests that the Inquisition granted to the females of a certain locality the right to denounce the guilt of their confessors, and how the number of priests incriminated was so great that thirty secretaries were engaged for sixty days in taking down the depositions of the women whom the confessors had seduced or attempted to seduce, till at length the depositions became so multitudinous and appalling that it was deemed best to suspend investigations and burn the records of infamy. In Italy the Memoirs of the Roman Catholic bishop of Pistoria and Prato were once published by the papist Italian government as a protest, and as evidence that state measures would be required to prevent the Italian nation from hastening to inevitable ruin. In these Memoirs is a deposition by the prioress of St. Catherine. She says: "In compliance with the request which you made me this day, I hasten to say something, but I know not how. Of those who are gone out of the world, I shall say nothing. Of those who are still alive, and hav very little decency of conduct, there are many. With the exception of three or four, all those whom I hav ever known, alive or dead, are of the same character; they hav all the same maxims and the same conduct. They are on more intimate terms with the nuns than if they were married to them! I repeat it; it would require a great deal of time to tell half what I know. It is the custom now, when they come to visit and hear the confession of a sick sister, to sup with the nuns, sing, dance, play, and sleep in the convent. It is a maxim of theirs that God has forbidden hatred but not love, and that man is made for woman and woman for man. I say that they can deceive the innocent and the most prudent and circumspect, and that it would be a miracle to converse with them and not fall! . . . The priests are the husbands of the nuns, and the lay brothers of the lay sisters. In the chamber of one of the nuns I hav mentioned, a man was one day found; he fled away, but soon after they gave him to us as our confessor extraordinary. How many bishops are there in the Papal States who hav come to the knowledge of those disorders, hav held examinations and visitations, and yet never could remedy it, because the monks, our confessors, tell us that those are excommunicated who reveal what passes in the order! Poor creatures! they think they are leaving the world to escape dangers, and they only meet with greater ones. Our fathers and mothers hav given us a good education, and here we hav to unlearn and forget what they hav taught us. Do not suppose that this is the case in our convent alone. It is just the same at St. Lucia, Prato, Pisa, Perugia, etc. I hav known things that would astonish you. Everywhere it is the same. Yes, everywhere the same disorders, the same abuses prevail. I say, and I repeat it, let the superiors suspect as they may, they do not know the smallest part of the enormous wickedness that goes on between the monks and the nuns whom they confess. The monks are all alike with their penitents."

If anyone believes that these things hav all passed away and that the priests of to-day are pure men, let him read Chiniquy's and Edith O'Gorman's books—accounts of to-day and of our own country. He will find that the confessional is "as lewdly suggestiv as ever it was, and the priests and priestesses of the Christian faith as grossly licentious as ever they were—a blight, a canker, and a curse to society as far as it comes under their influence." "There is not a Romish priest extant," says Dr. Nolan, "who has acted in the capacity of a confessor but must admit the truth of this observation, that each day's confessions had been the continued causes of unchaste excitements in his mind. Oh, my friends, there is no Romish clergyman, no matter how satisfied he may appear in your estimation, but must allow that the first subject of his own confession to another priest is an acknowledgment of his having indulged in unchaste thoughts on account of the indecent recitals made before him in the confessional. I could relate many practical proofs from others corroborativ of my statement, were it not that a principle of honor prescribes the necessity of silence in this respect. While I thus uplift the veil of mystic darkness from over the confessional, must not you yourselvs admit that this pretended tribunal of forgivness has been often, to your own knowledge, converted by the priest into an apology for crime? Has not this practice of inquisitorial debasement often exposed the weakness of the penitent, and has it not consequently furnished the lecherous dispositions of many priests with an easier and more appropriate mode of seduction? Has not the innocence of virginity been often despoiled through the confessional, and has not the morality of otherwise virtuous women been frequently corrupted through it? Is there a single diocese in Ireland but furnishes proofs of Romish clergymen who hav been suspended for the notorious crime of having converted the tribunal of confession into an apology for wickedness? The very diocese in which I officiated as a Romish clergyman affords sufficient proofs of the correctness of my statement. Yes, and were the privacy of the confessional to be fully developed, it would then be easily seen that such abuses at confession as hav been known would stand as rare specks on the general sheet of confessional corruption."

We say with Saladin, Enough! We can wade no further into this filth. To apply the words of Canon Stowell to the Christian Register's correspondent, we cannot feel free to think that any Unitarian will ever go himself, or allow his wife or daughter to go, to that slaughterhouse of freedom and purity. So far from being a safeguard for the young, or a means of moral teaching, the confessional is responsible for untold corruption, and is in itself a foul ceremonial, if the priests put to penitents the questions and suggestions taught in their "Moral" Theologies. Instead of being, as the Review insinuates, a means of relieving their troubled consciences on "certain subjects of a delicate nature which above all others need the advice of a trained, judicious, and wise spiritual director," it is the inquisition through which coarse, licentious men teach the young unmentionable vileness and accomplish purposes as black as their own Jesuitical natures. That anyone should counsel Protestant ministers to emulate the example of Rome's priests is monstrously infamous.

ACCOMPANYING a picture of a disreputable-looking, scrawny, and sanctimonious pedagog, Truth says: "This is a portrait of the Wisconsin school-teacher who persisted in reading prayers and the scripture, instead of teaching the boys. He looks it, doesn't he? He knows all about the laws of Moses, but nothing of the Constitution of the United States. He believes in flagellation and prayer, but the law is to him as a sealed book. He is just the fellow to bring up lads to vote for federal election, prohibitiv tariff, spoils to the victor, anti-liquor laws, corrupt balloting, and God in the Constitution."

WAVERLY, NEB., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for two years' subscription. I am an old subscriber. Allow my name to remain upon the "roll of honor" as a member in good standing in the big church of truth seekers. Wishing you prosperity personally, and an increased circulation of your grand paper, I remain, Yours truly, MRS. S. J. CARPENTER.

POCATELLO, IDA., July 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which you will please send me the pictorial book when finished. I hope to be able to get a good club in this glorious town of Freethought in the near future, both for the book and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Kind regards to Brothers Peck and Heston. May they liv long and prosper. C. PAULSAN.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, LEAVENWORTH, KAN., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I actually needed not to renew, because I find your paper regularly in our library. But as I am one of the oldest subscribers I hold on to it still. I am seventy years old. I concluded to hold out to the last. Every number I receive I send out on missionary work. I feel sorry to keep up the fight only with the paper. Some more ammunition would be more serviceable. P. MINKWITZ.

FRIEND, NEB., July 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4, for two copies of the picture book.

J. E. Remsburg will deliver three lectures here on the 19th and 20th of the month. The local paper of Friend printed a notice of the lectures, and I understand the Methodist parson, Rev. Mr. Barker, read his pedigree the next Sunday from the pulpit for daring to notice an Infidel lecture. We invited the reverend gentleman to attend the lectures.

NEWARK, N. J., July 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is natural to liv and die, but it is unnatural that children of one mother should exist in unequal conditions. Dame Nature should shower her blessings equally upon all of her children. All are entitled to their share of health and wealth. But unfortunately they are not possessed of just shares. Some are born in luxury and affluence, others in poverty and toil; some in health, others in disease; some comely and beautiful, others hideous to look at. Preachers say that all is brought in this world by an all-wise providence. Well, I answer there is very little equity in the distribution and no wisdom in partiality. If it is ignorance to be partial, then it is criminal for providence to be wise. Respectfully, W. W. MORRIS.

GIBSON, GA., July 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I put in my order some time ago for one copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and I see in the last TRUTH SEEKERS that it is now in press and wish to obtain one as early as possible. I herein inclose $2, which you will please receive and send the book as soon as you can get it ready.

I still keep laboring in the cause of Freethought and think I am doing some good. I am a careful reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read and then lend them out for others to read, and almost all who read them like them well. I shall keep trying for subscribers, and I hope for some success in the future. I liv in that portion of Georgia where orthodox Christianity has heretofore entirely predominated, and I am certain that Freethinking is now increasing. I am,

Ever yours in the cause of Mental Freedom,

NORTH AURELIUS, MICH., July 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I must tell you that we had a debate at our school-house on the affirmation that woman's intellect is equal to man's, and we had a lively old time. There was a Free Methodist minister there, and he told the ladies what the divine will was in regard to the sex. So you see he was interpreting God's will. Then I wanted to know what the speaker knew about the divine will. In the first place, I referred him to the Hindoo woman who throws her babe to the crocodiles to please the wrath of her God, through the interpreting of the divine will by her priest. Then I referred to the Catholic nunnery, and I wanted him to look at the young women in there by the same process of the priest. Then I referred to that dirty system of Mormonism, all kept up by the same process of the priest, all by the interpreting of the divine will of God. Then I spoke of burning witches, hanging Quakers and whipping them through streets tied to a cart's tail in mid-winter, and a good deal more which I hav not space to write. I say, away with such jackasses. The priests do not like me. JOSEPH LAKE.

STEP, ALA., July 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I want you to understand that you and the cause that you are so valiantly battling for has no better friend nor stronger advocate in this world than myself. The doctrin you teach seems to hav come to me by instinct, nature, twenty years ago, and coming under your influence for two or three years has only confirmed my natural conviction after trying to be a Christian and reading the Bible for thirty years. I am now as confirmed an Infidel as livs on earth. I am nearly seventy, but hav no fear of the future. I am much more happy than I used to be when trying to be a Christian. I am the only outspoken one in this section, but I tell you there is an undercurrent at work even here in this Christian land that some day after I hav gone over the river will be heard from. Policy and personal motivs is all that is clogging the wheels of progress here.

I want that picture Bible and must hav it. I think that will offset the beautiful story-book that has flooded this country in the past two years. My religion is my honesty, and I intend to fight it out on that line. If I was able I would buy everything on your list of books. I hope to be able to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER while I liv. All the reading I hav ever had favoring my natural position has been from your office. Poor Bennett, his works will liv always. Your friend, S. D. HOUSTON.

WAVERLY, WASH., July 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am in favor of the pictures. Many of them on the front page of the paper show up grand ideas, and for my part I cannot see how Christians can take offense at them, unless the truth is painted too plainly for them. When I was a boy I lived in the state of Iowa, and I was well acquainted with a man who lived in my neighborhood, who if anything derogatory to his standing or character was spread, and he knew it was a false charge against him, was perfectly unconcerned about it. But one time a bit of scandal was started on him which caused him to go on the warpath. When asked his reason for letting so many bad reports about himself go unnoticed, and being so hostil on this occasion, his reply was, "Gentlemen, lies don't hurt, don't amount to anything; but damn these truths!" And so with those Christians who look at these pictures and take offense at them. It is because the true aims and workings of Catholic and Protestant churches are shown up in such fine style. Hurrah for Heston, and may he hav a son growing up who will be able to fill his place after he is gone, if the world is not civilized until then. But I wish him a long life and plenty of happiness with his family, if he has one. I will send my mite for him after a while. B. F. DASHIELLE.

BLOOMDALE, O., July 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for one year's subscription for myself and friend, as we hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months, and are so well pleased with it that we think we cannot get along without it. And we owe a debt of gratitude to our friend for his efforts in inducing us to subscribe. I can say for myself that I obtained a great deal of useful information through the paper in regard to Bible questions.

I am at times a little diverted when talking with Christians on the subject of the Bible. They will all say, Oh, you will see the time when you will see your mistake. I will say, If I am mistaken I would like to see it now, and as the Christian people all over the world are praying to their God to show unbelievers the error of their ways for thousands of years it seems strange that he does not do it, which fully confirms the fact in my mind that there is no such thing as prayers being answered. And further, if he would only cause us to see our mistake just when we come to die, then it would be of no use to trouble ourselvs about it through life in trying to believe something that we cannot know anything about until we come to die. But I think we know just as much about that part of it as we ever will know. And another query in my mind is how there can be so many different creeds and doctrins, and all at war with each other, when they are all taken from the same book. It seems to me that if the book is the inspired word of God for the sole salvation of his people, it would be so that all could understand it alike. And another point is—some people will get up in their church and say that they are not living for this world but for the next, and still they try to get all of this world's goods that they can. DAN WINELAND.

COUNCIL VALLEY, IDA., July 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I like to read the "Letters from Friends." The Spiritualists are rather roughly handled in the issue of June 21st by Mr. Ward. It seems that Spiritualism is like the Gods and relics of all time. They could perform almost any feat when alone or among friends, but when a rabble of enemies had entered a sacred shrine, the God or relic was most provokingly inactiv. I am not a Spiritualist, for the same reasons that I am not a Christian. But I am willing to giv everyone his due. Theirs is a great improvement over Christianity in the fact that they are progressiv. This is obvious from the fact that they substitute a republican or Anarchistic form for the old monarchy of heaven. I tell you, progress on this little earth will tell, even to the farthest ends of space. I am satisfied that if we ever try Socialism and find it as represented, it will be adopted in the spiritual world. There would be vast advantages derived from its use there. A system of coöperativ telephones could be established between the atmospheres of different earthly associations, so when a spirit was wanted at another place he could be sent for instantly, thus saving the mortification of a medium in not always getting the proper answer.

But I always find a Spiritualist an economic reformer, so I think Atheists, Deists, Agnostics, and Spiritualists should all work together as Liberals, and not quarrel over the spoils that are not won. Whatever we may believe concerning a future existence, all Liberals stand on the ground that though our station in some future existence may depend on our development here, it does not depend on our belief or faith. This, I think, is the true Liberal position.

Then if we dispute in a friendly manner over these non-essentials, we should ever keep in view, working together for the reformation of mankind, measures as follows: First, get rid of that traditional compilation of stories known as the Bible, which is a standing defense of every act of mankind from king to beggar. Second, make mankind brothers by industrial reform. After these vital questions are solved, then we may turn our attention to the conflict between Spiritualism and Materialism, and to some extent settle that mental struggle. Let us hav coöperation now.

Send on some Harman blanks. We might as well petition Comstock as President Harrison, but nevertheless we will show him we are not asleep. J. P. TOWNLEY.

MARENGO, ILL., July 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In yours of the 12th inst. you made a statement which should not be passed by unnoticed by Materialists. You say incidentally, under the heading, "Fighting Ingersollism," that your "Spiritualistic friend Perry makes organs and confutes Materialists." Now, whether this was intended as a sarcasm or as a joke at some one's expense I know not, but at any rate it was great news to me, as well as, no doubt, to other Materialists, to see that they had been confuted by supernaturalists of any denomination, and by letting us know when and where we were thus placed hors du combat you will place us under obligations. If Materialists were confuted it must hav been by Spiritists telling us some of their experiences, or referring to several manifestations as irrefragable evidence of spirit existence, as I know of no other arguments they ever advanced to sustain their "spirit philosophy." Like the Christian who quotes scripture to prove the genuinness of the Bible, so do Spiritists adduce the visions mesmerically (or otherwise) produced to prove that there are spirits. One promis is precisely as valid as the other. They assume both are genuin, having such exuberant faith in them, and do not think it necessary to furnish other proof. They present a well-executed counterfeit of the genuin article—the Christian his Bible for his inspiration, etc., and the Spiritist his visions for his spirits—and claim that they are proof enough. They hold a bogus dollar before your eyes and say, "Don't you see it is a dollar—what more proof do you want?" That is Spiritualist and orthodox logic, and that is the way they "confute" the Materialist's arguments.

Or, perhaps, in an emergency, when hard pressed, they "confute" them as they did my challenge and the views therein expressed concerning the nature of these manifestations, namely, they ignore them entirely, which in former ages was considered evidence of being ignominiously cornered or floored! But the rules of discussion seem to hav changed since then. Now when anyone is silenced, he is considered the victor, having by his silence "confuted" his opponent. It must be a surprise, therefore, for Materialists to learn that they were confuted without knowing when and by whom. So they might as well prepare themselvs to pass all eternity in ethereal space, for thus having let Spiritists "confute" them by being caught napping, which will now render their souls immortal nili vili. No escape for them; Spiritualists hav so ordained it, so the other side may as well resign itself to its fate. And all this because they were "confuted" without even knowing that anyone had assailed their premises, except perhaps with ephemeral phantasmagoria of an overheated brain. H. WETTSTEIN.

STEUBENVILLE, O., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I had about made up my mind that I had nothing more to say on the question of naturalizing foreigners, especially Catholics, when I came across the following, which I clip from the Pittsburgh Dispatch of the 10th inst.:

NEW YORK, July 10.—The following communication from a correspondent at Antioch, North Syria, is published this afternoon: A Catholic priest, deep in the councils of Rome, whose intimacy I hav the fortune to possess, told me of a plan whereby the Maronite Catholics of Mount Lebanon intend to emigrate to the United States. Unable to get a permit from the sultan of Turkey, they will, by stealth, cross over to Cyprus, British territory, and sail thence, as some detachments hav already done. Another tremendous army of Asiatics is preparing to emigrate to the United States in the autumn. These last are Armenians. Even Armenian paupers in this region, returned to this country at the expense of Pennsylvania churches, are preparing to return in the autumn again to test the infinit folly of Americans. They entertain the most sovereign contempt for any law of Congress, as the infinit sham of an examination at New York has once been passed by them. With the continued grinding poverty and military burdens, with the increasing taxes, the great masses of western Asia and northern Africa are determined to go to the United States. Loving my country as my life, I earnestly invoke your instant attention to this alarming state of things, that in some way Congress may stem the torrent of these hordes of vandals, who will ultimately destroy American institutions. I am entirely sure that the Maronite Catholic movement is stimulated to the utmost by the Romanists. Let Congress awaken and check these movements. There is no time to be lost.

If any man who loves his country, whether nativ or adopted citizen, can doubt after reading that that the Catholic propaganda are conspiring to capture this country to the church, by an organized effort to get the majority of voters by any and all means in their power, he must be blind indeed; and if the hordes they are pouring in on us are all naturalized, their object will be gained in another decade, in my opinion. The naturalization laws must be repealed or worse will happen. The Catholic church has hundreds of societies armed and drilled, ready for the fray when they see their time has come. And lately at Pittsburgh was a convention of all of them to consolidate the whole into one army. Why is it the people are so supine while the enemy is laying his plans every hour, in secret and openly—openly enough to show his intention? People say to me: Oh, if it comes to that, we can put them down as we did the Southern rebels. But I tell them the Catholic church is a more wily foe than they ever had to deal with, and before they strike a blow they will hav the chains so wound around the body politic that it will be of very little use to struggle. What is done must be done at once, and one of the first things to be done is to stop naturalizing any foreigners; after that it may become necessary to confiscate the property that is held in trust by the bishop for the pope—to giv them the same medicin the Mormons (Confiscation of Mormon church property under the Edmunds act has been declared constitutional by the United States Supreme Court.) hav been treated with, and what the Mexicans and Brazilians hav had to do to keep the state out of the hands of the church.

JNO. DOWNES.

LEXINGTON, KY., July 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Philosophy has been instrumental in training the mental faculties which belong to our nature, but oftener, as in case of Rousseau (under whose auspices a good plow was invented, which seemed to arouse to new life the laboring classes of Europe), good has been done by the introduction of labor-saving machines. Mr. Heston's picture of the tools presented to the savage, is beautifully suggestiv.

But there is a strange fascination about those vivid, luminous thoughts and impressions which require no deep study; those deep, delusiv hopes and fears which are used by the clergy in charming and chaining the helpless mind.

The manacles we wear are fastened about us in childhood.

The horrid epoch of Nero also produced Seneca, but soon Christianity presented to man the deadly absinthe of religious faith. At once he becomes a demon, and civilization again is only the dream of the theorist.

Many things prevent the march of true evolution. The insane applause which greets the voice of the great orator who touches some heartstring, which sends forth rich melodies upon the air—even this may be a dead weight to improvement.

But all other contending influences are as nothing to the iron grip of the modern clergy, whose demoniac power will not giv us a chance to breathe the air of freedom of thought, which alone preserves truth intact. The clergy hav bound truth hand and foot, throwing her into a dimly lighted cavern which they call "religious society."

"The Protestants hav possession of the public schools," you say. The hellish and unreasonable opposition of the church to the dictates of reason shows plainly what awful calamities are just upon us, like monsters in a jungle just ready to spring upon our peaceful homes. The vulgar and prejudiced histories, to which the multitude cling, are like conventional masks upon the face of honor and unswerving rectitude. You might as well try to reason with a volcano or whirlwind as with a red-hot, money-loving clergyman, surrounded by his bloodthirsty, iron-handed, crafty minions. Dear friends, stand firm; the dawn is near. Like Voltaire, we will welcome every occasion for "avenging insulted humanity." "We would not love the world so well, did we not love honor more."

The modern Jew has his reasoning powers left uncorrupted because they hav not been drugged to death by the crazy dreams of the New Testament.

"No man of sound judgment can reconcile Sunday laws with the idea of personal freedom and the rights of man in the pursuit of happiness. The same spirit instigated the massacres of Bartholomew and Sicilian vespers, revoked the edict of Nantes, lighted the fires of Smithfield."

Who is this august character, this God in the schools, but a fierce monster without feeling or conscience, ready to kill, burn, and destroy his helpless victims, also denying justice to those giants of firmness, Reid and Harman, when even an eager, life-loving insect has a right to a good place in the universe. His Sunday and week-day persecutions are alike days of blood and infamy without reason, mercy, or justice.

But, sir, the reservation of lands for the poor by the government, is all that can save this great country from destruction. Will you, and Mr. Trueblood, and others, please elaborate a plan for this purpose, if you think it would meet the wants of the period? Are the poor to be crammed into loathsome corners by speculators who are wolves in human shape? Their gilded dens are the homes of the most ferocious animals, who always prey upon men, though their bloody hands are filled with Christian gold. ALHAZA.

SALIDA, CAL., July 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: This is the Fourth of July. I want to swear. May I? Not at the God-cursed church nor the priest-ridden populace, but at the Liberals. We had a free, just, secular government. Now what hav we? You hav told the story. Even the Rev. Mr. White, elder of the Materialist church, givs it up. But he does not vote as he prays—helps the priests shut up the saloons on Sundays. I do not know that this is church and state. You tell him. He will get right up from his devotions over God and his book, and set up God and his day. Wake him up; hold him up. Shake him over the hell on earth he is building for himself and his neighbors.

Truly it is all a mess. The state is a mere instrument of the church. Who is responsible? The majority. Who constitute the majority? Liberals—at least, non-church members—two to one. The priests bear rule and the people love to hav it so. The Liberals are responsible, first through their apathy and indifference, and second from their activity on the wrong side. They are too lazy to ascertain the facts, and when they do discover danger they are too lazy to think how their own actions will affect a desired result, and become more dangerous as friends than as enemies. And when not too lazy to think methodically, they are too cranky, lop-sided, and bull-headed to be governed by common sense and do anything that is practical or sensible.

The first class—the lazy Liberals—is fittingly represented by Elder White. No, he is not lazy—he is too busy in his amusements laughing at Heston's pictures or the crudities and absurdities of Bible characters to know anything about what the saints are doing in America. There is nothing to fear, say such men. Science is advancing. Hell is cooling off. God is cornered. The church is on its last legs. No danger except possibly from the Catholics.

Another class see danger and fight the church with voice and pen, but aid it with their votes. They invest the state with the same tyrannical powers that govern the church. Sinner and saint betray liberty with equal facility. And the state has nothing further to fear from church encroachment, for the Liberals hav already robbed it of all virility. A pious Comstock walks into the citadel of liberty by the same gate that paternal Wakeman opens. One prescribes for the body in the name of science; the other engineers the soul in the name of religion, and the man does not liv who can lay down a principle that would admit the one and exclude the other. The Anarchist can see this clearly, and yet, in the great fight between the two kinds of government—paternal and democratic—between liberty and slavery, church and state—he is content to be a neutral or bestow two kicks upon the state to one against the church. And yet he knows that his own liberty is at stake. He knows that law is, law has been, law will be, and the only question is as to the character of that law. He knows that organization alone can meet organization; knows that there is no power on earth that can grapple with an ambitious priesthood except the state; knows that that state will be as Liberal as the Liberals make it. And yet he is content to do nothing or worse than nothing, atoning for each stab at the state by making a face at Comstock. If three of these braves should happen to fraternize, fall into line, and pucker in concert, how the vice agent would tremble.

Just now the Anarchists extraordinary hav the field. The average Liberal has no devotion, is not in earnest about anything. These will sacrifice themselvs, their friends, and their cause on the slightest provocation—sacrifice them to a whim, a fancy, a mere question of words. These are doing valiant work for church and state and Comstock. They are the especial friends of women. Let us see. Woman's first need is not talk, but a home; not agitation, but protection; a just status in marriage and society. Not criticism, but betterment; not ranting, but a remedy. These Radicals hav no remedy, and woman's last estate under their régime is worse than the first. The Shakers are the only Liberals who hav done anything to better woman's condition. I say this in full view of all my honorable sisters are saying all the time ad nauseam in Lucifer, and I aver they are as unwise and unbalanced on this question as their orthodox sisters are on the temperance issue. They hav been all through a damage to Harman and a detriment to their own cause.

But if rational discussion be the need on this question of sex, the Heywoods and the Harmans are taking just the course to make it impossible. They hav no issue with either Judge Foster or Carpenter over this. They hav no occasion for martyrdom except as they manufacture it. Their cause is not the cause of women nor of free speech. It is not the cause of the Liberal press. On the contrary, they are jeopardizing the very existence of every Liberal paper in the land. Why, then, should the Liberal press make it their cause? Why rush to their defense, to shield them from the known consequences of their course—a course which they hav repeatedly denounced as willful, stubborn, or foolhardy? This is no time to be led away by sympathy. I know its power, but I protest against its influence. Are we so clannish as to support a Liberal simply because he is a Liberal, to any and every extent? There is no propriety nor consistency, no sense, in appealing to the law in favor of those who uniformly defy the law and propose to continue it. There is just one thing for these men to do—promis to stop printing needlessly offensiv matter. In the name of all that is at stake in the death grapple between liberty and slavery, church or state, I protest against the Liberal forces being led off and scattered, to waste their strength over minor matters and personal, frivolous issues. C. M. CLINTON.

PHILADELPHIA, July 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Although I am a Liberal of thirty years' standing, I am, as yet, but a new subscriber to your grand and truly American paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am supplied with my paper by the news agent of our district. I think that this method givs more publicity to your paper, and might prove the means of securing to you some new subscribers among people that I cannot reach myself. I know that the pictures hav already attracted attention, and may create an interest. Hence, my object. I am highly pleased with the paper myself. I admire the style of many of the articles I find in it. They are plain, sharp, and convincing; true, reasoning, and indisputable. They are exactly what is wanted for the times. Religion is not given much to reason, therefore we must keep hammering at it incessantly. Religion is founded upon nothing and nourished by ignorance, and as we know the elements with which we hav to deal, we must persevere with our truth and logic, and endeavor to light up that spark of reason which is found from time to time.

It has been my misfortune, here of late, to run counter with people who are of the God-in-the-Constitution persuasion. These people are the most obdurate, callous, and unreasonable of all that I ever met. Their argument is for church power alone; they care not about the rights and liberties of others. They say that, as the Christians are in the strongest numbers, they hav a right to demand a Sunday law, or any other law for the benefit of the church, and that the legislature has a right to enact them, and that the state has a right to enforce them. I hav also read statements in the daily papers to the same effect. If such statements are true, then of what worth, importance, or consideration is the Constitution? If I understand it rightly, the Constitution is a document of the states, by the states, and for the states. The Constitution embraces a code of laws in conformity with all those principles necessary for the establishment of a perfect liberty, and that will accord to all American citizens equal rights and privileges. While the Constitution will tolerate all manner of religions, whose creeds do not conflict in any way with its general character, it cannot, nor dare not, acknowledge any religious gods. To the contrary, it declares a separation of church and state. Is this not an invitation to the Christian church, or any other church, to keep their hands off? As the Constitution of the United States is made by the states, it therefore becomes a part and parcel of each state. If, therefore, states enact any law to the benefit of any church, do they not thereby acknowledge the power of such church, and violate their obligations to the United States? And if they enforce such religious laws, do they not enslave all American citizens who are not followers of the state's favorit church? The Constitution guarantees to every American citizen his or her religious liberty. Any citizen has a right to worship either of the score of gods now in vogue. And while doing so, people of other gods hav no right to molest them, nor to enforce the laws of other gods upon them. Do the Christians, as true, patriotic American citizens, endeavor to preserve their rights to American citizens? No! But they enact laws in the interest of their own church, and enforce them upon all the people; rob them of their citizenship, reduce them to slavery, and set the organic laws of the nation at defiance. Can such tyranny, such outrages against the rights of citizens, be sustained by the lying howl of state rights? If such diabolical legislation is state's rights, could not any other religion or creed, on gaining strength by numbers, rule a state supreme also, by having laws enacted to the particular benefit of its own church? Hav not the Mormons as good a right to rule a state in the name of their church as the Christians hav? Hav not the Jews the same right also? And if, in the early future, the Liberals should find themselvs the greater power of a state, could we not then retaliate against religion, by making tyrannical laws for its suppression? Could we not establish the fact that religion is witchcraft in a new form, and enact laws for its abolishment? Would religion then ask for state rights? No. They would appeal to the government, and ask for their religious liberty; which they would hav a right to do, and they would also hav a right to hav their prayers granted. We are now asking for our American liberty. We hav no redress. We appeal to the religionists themselvs. They are inexorable. They will concede nothing, but deny us everything, even our birthright. This is church power and not state right, as the church would hav us believe. They thus work their schemes of usurpation and coercion from behind the bulwarks of the state. A state's first right, and first duty, is to annul or repeal all such iniquitous laws, and thereby preserve to her citizens their religious liberty and protect them against unlawful taxation. Does this power, appropriated by the Christian church, to abuse, to torture, to destroy, come of divine inspiration? If so, then it behooves the liberty-loving American citizens to place themselvs in conflict array, to despoil the enemy of our peace, and to destroy the destroyer of the innate attributes of the men of men.

When by man our land is scourged,
In the name of Gods, divine;
Mighty truth shall be our sword,
Our love, to liberty's shrine.

We are told that religious priests, or ministers, are called by God, to teach his gospel. If this is true, then what shall we say concerning the variegated Christianity as we find it to-day, divided into parts, cut into fragments, tattered and torn, rent asunder by quarrels and dissensions arising from the superstitious prejudices? And all of these quarrelsome, snarling puppets of God are called to preach God's gospel, everyone teaching differently. Discord and disunion is now the only motiv power to their religious enthusiasm. And God himself—he is the right kind of a God for the Christians. He is flexible. He is one God to many different denominations and creeds. He backs up all they say of him, no matter how various. It is the Jews without a Christ, and the Christians with a Christ. It is the Catholics with a purgatory, and the Protestants without a purgatory. It is the Methodists with their terrible hell, and the Universalists without any hell. I can but admire this generosity and leniency on God's part. He allows Christians to believe as they please. And if Christians wish to appear as godly as they claim to be, they will accord these same rights to all other people. If it were possible for the Jews, by increasing in their numbers, to raise once more in the ascendant, God would return, like a boomerang, to his starting-point. He would disown his son, Christ, and excommunicate the Holy Ghost. We should then hav once more the God of our fathers, of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and of Solomon, the wise king, who had children enough to fill his great temple at Jerusalem. We would hav the old system of burnt offering and sacrifice restored. Witches would again abound, to counsel the kings of God's nations, presidents, and congresses. Governors and legislatures would become a thing of the past, as the laws of man are as blasphemy compared with the divine knowledge of priests and kings, obtained through the agency of God's witches.

Tithes and tributes would be levied upon all the people for the support of the church, no matter of what creed, color, nationality, or previous condition. The Sabbath Saturday law would go into practice once more, the social system of polygamy would become prevalent again, and God would sanction all of these things to-day as he did in days of yore.

When men made their God, they fashioned his character like unto that of men, that God himself might appear more godly.

I will change the subject, and close, by inserting this from the Philadelphia Record:

THE LIVES OF MEN.

'Tis strange about the lives of men.
They liv, they love, they die. And then.
What, then? Ah, don't I wish I knew;
But really cannot tell. Can you?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Six and Sixty.

Light of the morning,
Darling of Dawning,
Blithe little, lithe little daughter of mine!
While with thee ranging Sure I'm exchanging
Sixty of my years for six years like thine.
Wings cannot vie with thee,
Lightly I fly with thee,
Gay as the thistledown over the lee;
Life is all magic,
Comic or tragic,
Played as thou playest it daily with me.

Floating and ringing
Thy merry singing
Comes when the light comes, like that of the birds.
List to the play of it!
That is the way of it;
All's in the music and naught in the words—
Glad or grief-laden,
Schubert or Hadyn,
Ballad of Erin or merry Scotch lay,
Like an evangel
Some baby angel
Brought from sky nursery stealing away.

Surely I know it,
Artist nor poet
Guesses my treasure of jubilant hours.
Sorrows, what are they?
Nearer or far, they
Vanish in sunshine, like dew from the flowers;
Years, I am glad of them!
Would that I had of them
More and yet more, while thus mingled with thine.
Age, I make light of it!
Fear not the sight of it.
Time's but our play mate, whose toys are divine.

—T. W. Higginson in Century.

Ned and His Pony.

A pony had been given to Ned,
To his delight and joy,
A tiny little quadruped
To suit a tiny boy.

But tiny boys of course increase
In size, their legs grow long;
And ere two years had passed away
Ned was both tall and strong.

"I'm in an awkward fix," he cried,
"For this will never do;
My feet will soon be on the ground
Unless his legs grow too!"

But, boys, do you suppose that steed
Would grow an inch? Not he.
He'd trot and gallop, eat and drink,
But that was all, you see.

His growing days were done before
He ever came to Ned,
And as the boy took in this truth,
"I'm in a fix," he said.

One day, when he was riding fast,
The pony cast a shoe;
Cries Ned, "We'll visit blacksmith Joe,
And see what he can do."

Joe pared the sturdy little hoof,
He pared and pared away,
The while young master watched the deed
In horror and dismay.

At length he spoke, "Look here now, Joe,
I don't feel quite at ease;
My pony's small enough just now,
Don't make him smaller, please!"

A Bright Speech.

BY A RISING YOUNG MAN.

At a Fourth of July celebration (this year) George J. Remsburg was called upon to make a speech. He responded in a few remarks from which the following extracts are taken: "Ladies and Gentlemen, Fellow-citizens: I hav been called upon to make a speech and I am sorry to say that I am unprepared, but nevertheless I am going to say a few words, for on an occasion like this—when we hav assembled together to celebrate the glorious Fourth of July—I can hardly refrain from giving utterance to my feelings. But when I realize the true greatness and grandeur of this memorable day, I can not summon words strong enough to express my feelings. I feel that we are doing our duty when we meet here in this shady grove 'amid the beneficent fruition of nature,' to celebrate this memorable day, for just one hundred and fourteen years ago to-day, my fellow-citizens, the old liberty bell in Philadelphia 'proclaimed liberty throughout the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof.' The sword of Washington, together with the pens of Paine and Jefferson, and the eloquent appeals of Patrick Henry, James Otis, and the Adamses, were the originators of American independence, and it was this strong pillar upon which they laid the foundation of our republic. Many a brave man has bared his bosom to the storms of shot and shell for the sake of American independence. Brave men were with Washington on the bloody field of Monmouth. They fought by the side of the dying Warren on the blood-soaked ridge of Bunker Hill. They were with Arnold and Montgomery in their heroic charge upon Quebec. They were with Lafayette and Pulaski at the Brandywine; with Stark at Bennington; with Arnold at Saratoga; with Wayne at Stony Point; with DeKalb at Camden, and on every bloody field of the Revolution they fought, bled, and died that their country might be free. No nation in the world can boast of men who fought with more courage, bravery, and determination than did the soldiers of the American Revolution. They were inspired by the thought of independence; their souls were animated by the sentiment of that lofty declaration of Patrick Henry, 'Giv me liberty or giv me death,' and they pushed ahead, heedless of the flying shot and shell that swept their ranks like a wild tornado. O America! how can you fail to honor your brave defenders? They made you the grandest nation on earth—they placed upon your brow a wreath of everlasting glory. At their feet lie the great evils that hav threatened the destruction of your liberties, on their swords and bayonets is written your history, and by their sides stand the glorious stars and stripes without a stain on them."

Corner Gospel.

PRECIOUS TIME.

Do we realize the value of time? Not generally. We waste it. We squander it. We throw it away in the most reckless manner. Here an hour, there another, until the greater part of daylight has flown, no one knows whither, and the hour for sleep has come. But what shall we do with it? Oh, there is so much, so very much, to do. Development of mind and body, of all the faculties, is imperativ upon us. By making the most of ourselvs we make the world better, we contribute to the general welfare. Life is sweet as we use time properly and profitably. It is a burden when we dawdle aimlessly and foolishly along, throwing the costly possession of time away as lightly as thistledown floats on the air.

Time is ours now. Let us employ it. The message is always, Do something, be something. The flowers of light, life, and beauty are on the mountain-top. They are for you, but you alone must pluck them. Another can not gather them for you. The glittering jewels of science and truth are for you, but you must strive for them yourself. Action, employment, energy, toil, are necessary adjuncts to honorable living. Time will not wait. The surging waves go on and on, flowing faster and faster. If you do not steer your craft you must drift, you know not where. The gold of time is the faithful use of it.

How many might truthfully put up some such notice as this, as suggested by that fine thinker and teacher, Horace Mann: Lost, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two—or more—golden hours, each one set with sixty diamond minutes. No reward is offered, for they are gone forever."

Then let us resolve to lose not one precious minute of time, but use each with all care and diligence.

Gather your roses while you may,
Old Time is still a-flying,
And this same flower that blooms to-day
To-morrow may be dying.

S. H. W.

To Miss Mary Foster.

No, I do not smoke or chew tobacco, nor do I hav any very bad habits. Womankind will ever pick up rubbish where she could find gems. She still holds fast to Christ for an example and leaves our noble Ingersoll in the cold.

She-ol is used simply to scare womanhood, for if he-ll was used it would remove her holy horror of that place; but God's domains are still called he-aven for a sort of drawing card.

Perhaps Sam('s)son ought to hav been mentioned, but it must be remembered that a woman was the cause of all his misfortunes. And while Bible characters are being named, Ham Ilton, named after the colored gentleman who went up in the ark, should not be forgotten.

Of course

"Mistress Mary, quite contrary,"

would never be so mean as to mention Mad(i)son.

No doubt "She-cago" should belong to the fair sex, for it has long been noted for its large-footed girls. But it must be remembered that "She-cago" is (in) Ill.

Did I cry when I was first put into breeches? Well, no. I felt prouder than a peacock and richer than Crœsus, and perhaps the happiest day in my life was when I shed petticoats and bloomed into a full-grown boy.

The judges of the Supreme Court may wear gowns, but that is so they may be distinguished from the prisoners. But it makes them look more like fools than judges.

I think the women must hav a mortgage on the "mother tongue;" for if they are not careful they will wear it out. But those who use it most wisely are the master minds.

No, there are no "sir maids," but there are mer men. But is it not rather unpatriotic to compare imaginary mermaids to the "father of his country?"

If the Milky Way belongs to womanhood, how does it happen that it is composed of so many sons (suns)?

"There is hope for the world when womanhood awakes." Of course she has not yet, but the world seems to get along all right without her help.

Where did girls get that barbarous custom of boring their ears? I think they must hav borrowed it from the Africans.

"When you praise us you declare that we outweigh the universe, and are angelic enough to dwell in starry spheres."

Perhaps some of Miss Mary's masculin friends hav seen fit to render her such praise. If so she undoubtedly deserves it—the last part at least; but I think the first part must be a little exaggerated.

Worcester, Mass. WALTER W. CLARK.

[The above communication ends the sharp little tilt between two among the brightest and wittiest of our large and constantly increasing family. If continued, it must be by private correspondence; but we shall be always glad to hear from both of our smart young friends upon topics of general interest. —ED. C. C.]

A Parable of Love.

"I'll master it," said the ax; and his blows fell heavily on the iron.

But every blow made his edge more blunt, until he ceased to strike.

"Leave it to me," said the saw, and with his relentless teeth he worked backward and forward on its surface until they were all worn down, and broken he fell aside.

"Ha, ha!" said the hammer. "I knew you wouldn't succeed. I'll show you the way."

But at the first fierce blow off flew his head, and the iron remained as before.

"Shall I try?" asked the soft, small flame.

They all despised the flame, but he curled gently around the iron, embraced it, and never left it until it melted under his irresistible influence.

There are hearts hard enough to resist the force of wrath, the malice of persecution, and the fury of pride, so as to make their acts recoil on their adversaries; but there is a power stronger than any of those, and hard indeed is the heart that can resist love.

A Bird Story.

The Examiner tells a pretty story of two birds in Dr. Prime's collection. Last spring one of the old birds, a gray sparrow, became blind. Straightway a little dark brown and white bird, known as a Japanese nun, and named Dick, became the sparrow's friend. The sparrow's home had a round hole as a doorway. Little Dick would sit down on a perch opposit the hole and chirp. The blind bird would come out, and guided by Dick's chirps would leap to the perch, and so on to the seed cup and water bottle. But the most curious part of the performance was when the blind sparrow would try to get back into the house. Dick would place the sparrow exactly opposit the hole by showing him along the perch. When opposit, Dick would chirp, and the blind bird would leap in, never failing.

Correspondence.

STILLWATER, MONT., June 29, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, because I saw other children's letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is my first letter in the Children's Corner. My father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time. My class-mate and I look in the Children's Corner and read the letters of every paper. I think I will write to a girl named Maggie Sailor.

My father has been wanting my sister and me to write to you for a long time. He is a ranchman with lots of sheep, and I liv too far to go to school in town. We hav a little home school where we study both school books and music.

I went to a circus on my birthday and had a nice time. Mamma gave me mitts, cap, and a gold pen for my birthday present. I like to hav gir s and boys write to me. Well, I will close for this time. From

ABBIE HUNDLEY.

"A SWITCH is matter," said the boy;
"It guides my acts, I find;
'Tis thus a force my folks employ
Of matter over mind."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

CONTENTION over the federal election bill wages hotly. Democrats say it will enable a party in power to continue indefinitly. To the Democratic designation of it as a "force" bill, Republicans urge that it is not for force, but against the force which, they allege, now dominates Southern balloting.

NEW YORK'S population, estimated by the local supervisor of the census at 1,620,000, is put by National Census Superintendent Porter at 1,513,501. It is said, with what truth we do not know, that Porter under-estimates the city to deprive it of one of its eight representativs in Congress.

DISPATCHES announce a declaration of war between the Central American republics of San Salvador and Guatemala. A battle, rumor says, has been fought between armies each of which numbered about 10,000 to 20,000. Salvador is a small republic of the size of New Jersey, with a population of 700,000, all but 10,000 aboriginal or mixed races. Guatemala is an older republic, nearly as large as Pennsylvania, with a population of 1,400,000, of whom one-third are European. The nations had long been jarring, and a breach was expected. There is no good cause, and the movement is disgraceful. Some think that the United States should compel the belligerents to make peace. But these dispatches may be contradicted and shown to be but rumors by later ones.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT makes all doctrins plain and clear?—
About two hundred pounds a year.
And that which was proved true before,

—Butler.

THE principal reason why the churches hav wanted people to go their road is, that tolls might be collected. They hav regarded unbelievers as the owners of turnpikes do people who go 'cross lots. The toll-gate man always tells you that other roads are dangerous—filled with quagmires and quicksands.—Ingersoll.

IN their writings and conversations the philosophers of antiquity asserted the independent dignity of reason.—Gibbon.

ONE of the worst things about the Bible, one of the worst in the averagc religion, is that it demands the sacrifice of self-respect. Every man is compelled to admit, before he becomes a Christian—before he is fit even for conversion—that he is wholly and thoroughly depraved in thought and act, in mind and flesh; and, in addition to this, he must giv up and throw away the fruit of his experience, observation and reason. Voluntarily he goes back to the childhood of the race. He becomes a frightened barbarian—an anxious savage.—Ingersoll.

FORMERLY, whoever was possessed of a secret in any art, was in danger of passing for a sorcerer; every new sect was charged with murdering infants in its mysteries; and every philosopher who departed from the jargon of the schools, was accused of Atheism by knaves and fanatics, and condemned by blockheads. Anaxagoras dares to assert, that the sun is not conducted by Apollo, mounted in a chariot and four; he is condemned as an Atheist, and compelled to fly. Aristotle is accused of Atheism by a priest, and not being powerful enough to punish his accuser, he retires to Chalcis.—Voltaire.

EVERY man who finds a fact, is the enemy of theology.—Ingersoll.

EVERY man should stand for a force which is perfectly irresistible. How can any man be weak who dares to be at all? Even the tenderest plants force their way up through the hardest earth and the crevices of rocks; but a man no material power can resist. What a wedge, what a beetle, what a catapult, is an earnest man! What can resist him!—Thoreau.

ACTION is the highest perfection and drawing forth of the utmost power, vigor, and activity of man's nature.—South.

FORCE can be neither created nor destroyed.—Buchner.

A MOVEMENT in favor of Materialism has arisen in Germany. . . . The third and most popular expounder of these Materialistic views is Büchner, in his book, "Matter and Force," which was first published in 1850, has run through a great many editions, and has been also translated into English. It it not necessary to expatiate upon the views of these writers. Their handling turns partly on the accumulated proofs, physiological and other, of the dependence of mind and body, and partly upon the more recent doctrins as to matter and force, summed up in the grand generality known as the correlation, conservation, or persistence of force. This principle enables them to surpass Priestley in the cogency of their arguments for the essential and inherent activity of matter; all known force being, in fact, embodied in matter. Their favorit text is "no matter without force, and no force without matter." The notion of a quiescent impassiv block, called matter, coming under the influence of forces ab extra, or superimposed, is, they hold, less tenable now than ever. Are not the motions of the planets maintained by the inherent power of matter? And, besides the two great properties called inertia and gravity, every portion of matter has a certain temperature, consisting, it is believed, of intestin motions of the atoms, and able to exert force upon any adjoining matter that happens to be of a lower temperature. Then they ask with Priestley and Ferrier, "Why introduce a new entity, or rather a nonentity, until we see what these multifarious activities of matter are able to accomplish?"—Prof. Bain.

Vol. 17. No. 31. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, August 2, 1890 } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

CHRISTIANITY seems to be largely a matter of climate. Even our preachers now giv us over and take to the woods.—Boston Commonwealth.

THE European Peace Congress arrived at the conclusion that declarations of war should be subject to national control. The democratic principle is to be applied in its most elementary form.

AT the beginning of this century 21,000,000 persons spoke English, 31,500,000 French, 30 000,000 German, 31,000,000 Russian, 26,000,000 Spanish, and 16,000,000 Italian. Now 125,000,000 persons talk English, 50,000,000 French, 70,000,000 German, 40,000,000 Spanish, 70,000,000 Russian, and 30,000,000 Italian.

HYPNOTISM has reached that point that the French authorities think of creating a superior council of medical jurisprudence at the Ministry of Justice, to be composed of medical men and magistrates, who will be required to giv opinions as to the responsibility of criminals in connection with the questions of suggestion and hypnotism, and of heredity.

THERE should be a statute forbidding politicians to meddle with the truth in any manner. Some may object that such a law is unnecessary, for the reason that politicians very rarely do meddle with the truth. But they do sometimes, and when they do truth is in danger of great bodily harm, and truth should be protected, for it is sometimes quite useful. —Kent Advertiser.

IT is stated that $800,000,000 of church property is now exempt from taxes in the United States. This, if fairly assessed, would yield a revenue of $10,000,000 a year, or nearly enough to support our poor. As it is, a large number who never enter a church are paying far more than their just share of the burden of taxation. If this is justice, some people cannot see it in that light.—La Salle Republican.

A CATHOLIC journal's correspondent in Italy complains that "the country is overrun with Masonic and anti-clerical processions; the numerous fetes and commemorations of revolutionary heroes and celebrated unknowns hav brought about several riots in public places. M. Crispi has forbidden the celebration of any Christian feast outside the churches, or without the permission of a prefect."

AT the instance of Bishop Alexander of Moscow, reports the Sun, the arrangement of funeral processions has been taken out of the hands of undertakers. The clerical council of the city hav established a funeral bureau, whose function is to arrange all funeral processions of the city of Moscow for the rich and the poor, according to the orders of the mourning families. There will be seven classes of obsequies, each according to the price which the mourners may be willing to pay.

THE Political World, of London, says: "The Sunday question has cropped up in New South Wales, where it appears there are some pious people who think it wicked to indulge in innocent amusement and recreation on Sundays. Curiously enough an old imperial act of George III., making Sunday entertainment illegal, has been found by the courts to apply to the colony. A well-known colonial theatrical manager has been fined for contravention of this moldy statute. But the victory gained in the law courts by the promoters of the proceedings is, after all, a doubtful advantage, seeing that this attempt to revive antiquated statutes was strongly condemned by the judges, who, indeed, expressed themselvs in favor of a reform of the law so that the subject of Sunday entertainment might be placed on a footing more in accordance with the general view of the present day."

A SOMEWHAT imbittered contest over the teaching of German in the public schools in Indianapolis has resulted in a victory, temporarily at least, for the Germans. A decision was rendered in the circuit court last week in their favor. The decision is based entirely upon section 4,497 of the Indiana Statutes, which provides that whenever twenty-five parents or guardians shall so demand it shall be the duty of school trustees to employ teachers to giv instruction in the German language. The court thinks that there is no room for doubt as to the intent of the law. The city school board will appeal the case to the supreme court.

THE pope's allocution in the private consistory of June 26th, reads in part: "We cannot be restrained from raising our voice anew, and we cry out with reason, in all freedom of soul, as the hostility of our enemies fastens itself upon the last remnants of ecclesiastical property. In that war which lasts so long against the church, she is each day the object of new outrages and attacks. Nevertheless we do not despair, because we place the greatest and the firmest hope in divine aid. God himself will defend his rights, and he will giv to us—to us who battle for his glory and the salvation of men —the strength to struggle and the power to conquer."

THE Sabbatarians are flying at high game, attacking the queen for violating their commandments. That wicked old lady allows military bands to play on Sunday afternoons on the east terrace of Windsor Castle, and the set of busybodies who call themselvs the Lord's Day Observance Society, scandalized by this act, hav addressed a letter to the queen asking her to suppress the bands. They tell her majesty that she is hindering Christian efforts to instruct the young and to win to holiness multitudes who are in sore need of instruction in the truths of God's holy word. This impudent cant has thus far been left to answer itself, save so far as it is greatly ridiculed in the secular press.

THE greatest money-extorting machine that ever existed is the Romish church. As one good authority recently asserted, "She always givs nothing for nothing." She never helps the poor unless she gets ten times as much back. She mortgages the orphans in her asylums, body and soul, for what she expects from them in the future. The Boston Herald of Sunday said: "In Denver, Col., there has lately been opened a convent for aged widows of means, who may wish to spend their remaining years in retirement and prayer. They must be free from all family ties and willing to liv under the vows of religion in obedience, poverty, and chastity. Their occupation will be reparation to the Sacred Heart. As all are destined to a life of prayer, with no occupation, it is necessary that each shall hav a dowry sufficient for her support. The amount required is $4,000."—British-American Citizen.

A DISPATCH from Troy, N. Y., describes a second attempt by the electric light company to erect its pole before the Church of the Visitation. The court having decided in the company's favor, and issued an injunction restraining interference by the congregation, a detachment of workmen proceeded to the work. In the mean time the congregation responded to the call from the church bell, the tolling of which was understood by all of them. The women, upon their arrival, planted themselvs upon the ground, and the employees of the electric light company, who were instructed to erect it, were thus foiled. They stood by dumfounded, but when urged by the superintendent to complete the work they made a raid. They were warded off by the women, who fought vigorously. A riot was feared, and the sheriff of the county called out the Saratoga Citizens' Corps. Their services, however, were not needed, for the trouble was quieted, and at a late hour everything was quiet. The trouble may be renewed, for the electric light company is determined to set the poles, and the church people are equally determined that it shall not complete the work. The militia will be kept in readiness, and in a few minutes' notice will be on the ground.

VICE-CHANCELLOR BIRD has rendered a decision for the plaintiff in the suit of Mrs. Mary Pieroni against Father Patrick Corrigan, of Hoboken, in which it was sought to recover a piece of land and several houses at Fort Lee, N. J., which the woman alleged she had deeded to the priest in consideration of a promis on his part to secure for her a separation from her husband. The complainant alleges that Father Corrigan failed to carry out the agreement, and that as a result her husband came back to liv with her and wouldn't go away again. Father Corrigan, in his answer, denies all the allegations of the complaint so far as they involved any wrongdoing on his part, and alleges that he had paid Mrs. Pieroni $1,000 for the real estate, and that there was no other consideration involved in the transaction. The vice chancellor's opinion declares that the evidence is strongly in favor of the complainant, and decrees that the conveyance of the property to the priest be set aside.

A PAMPHLET about to be published by Signor Toscanelli declares that in 1889 there was really a project for the pope's departure from Rome. His departure had been arranged with the French embassador at the Vatican, who contrived to leave in such a manner as to excite suspicion, and then telegraphed to the pope from Paris: "It is necessary to act promptly, all is ready." The Italian government, on being informed of this, had the Vatican strictly watched, in order that it might know of the pope's departure as soon as it took place. In consequence of this the clerical journals complained and the Vatican demanded an explanation from Signor Crispi, who replied that the surveillance had been instituted in order that the government might be made aware of the departure of the pope, for as the immunity of the guarantee extended to the pope's person and not to the Vatican, the latter would, in case of the pope's flight, be immediately occupied and declared Italian territory, making it forever impossible for the holy father to come back. It was this condition that caused the project to be abandoned.

"RECENTLY, on a run between Buffalo and Cleveland on the Lake Shore road," said a dining-car conductor to a Sun writer, "I had as guests Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Ingersoll. At dinner an amusing incident occurred. Mr. Ingersoll and his wife were seated at a table by themselvs, when three traveling men came in and seated themselvs just back of them. None seemed to recognize the colonel at first, but suddenly one of the party sighted him, and hastily motioning me to him, ordered a quart of champagne iced and sent to Mr. Ingersoll's table with his compliments. It was quite evident that he had no personal acquaintance with the colonel, but merely wanted to open the way to one. I got the wine ready and carried out my instructions regarding it, when Mr. Ingersoll, without a glance at the donor, promptly and politely declined it, and I, of course, so reported to Mr. Smarty. At the conclusion of the meal, as Mr. Ingersoll rose to leave the car, the drummer ventured the hope that he had not offended by his act, when the colonel, with a smile, said: 'Oh, no; but the fact is my physician has forbidden me the use of wines or liquors,' and he bowed and passed on."

VIOLENT anti-religious feeling has been excited in Vienna by a case of abduction by nuns. Five years ago Frau Pajor, a married stage singer, placed her little daughter with the Ursuline nuns of Bad Fuered. Some days ago the mother came to claim her child, who is now sixteen years old. A remarkable and pathetic scene occurred. The girl refused to go with her mother, and turned a deaf ear to her touching appeals. It seems that the daughter has been imbued with a prejudice against the life of an actress. She refused to recognize or accompany her mother. The nuns encouraged her in this decision. Frau Pajor, however, continued to plead with her daughter, and finally, after a violent scene, in which the nuns participated, she succeeded in getting the girl to accompany her. A few days later a schoolmate of the girl and one of the nuns called upon the mother and girl. Frau Pajor, not thinking of losing her daughter again, went to the theater, leaving her with the visitors. Upon returning home late at night she was surprised to find her child gone. It is supposed that the girl returned to the convent, as no trace of her has been found. At the convent admittance was refused to Frau Pajor.

SUPERSTITION is always at its hight when trouble oppresses the heart. This is true of nations as well as of individuals. In Russia the most absurd superstitions are rampant at the present time. Prophets of evil appear in almost every province and city. Quite recently such a prophet, announcing the destruction of Odessa, appeared in the theater of that place and came near creating a panic. In Serpookhov, in the government of Moscow, a similar but more characteristic incident occurred. An official announcement was placarded on the street corners. The common people of that godly place are unable to read. They requested a man who looked like a priest to decipher for them the contents of the bill. He unhesitatingly and positivly declared that it contained the warning that the city of Serpookhov would be swallowed in the ground. In less than an hour the news spread throughout the place, and the people abandoned their work and began streaming out into the fields in large crowds. All the factories were deserted by the laborers. It took some time before the frightened crowds were restored to reason and to their regular pursuits; but the originator of the trouble could not be found. So, also, false prophets, wizards, clairvoyants, and mystics of this kind hav made their appearance in Kharkov, Kursk, and Kiev. Happily in all instances serious trouble has been averted by the prompt interference of the authorities.

NEVER was a more wonderful mingling of strange elements than in this great temple of the holy sepulcher. The Greeks hav one portion of it, the Latins or Roman Catholics another, the Armenians a third, and there is also a division, I think, for the Copts. In the holiest sanctuaries of all, where, as all believe, the Lord was crucified and buried, there hav been struggles, sometimes ending in bloodshed, between the confiicting churches. People say that still, but for the Turkish soldiers about, such struggles would take place again. The special moment of danger when such unseemly strife has happened has been the moment of the supposed miracle of the holy fire, which takes place on the Saturday between Good Friday and Easter, according to the Greek calendar. On this day, in the afternoon, the Greek patriarch comes down with a solemn procession to the holy sepulcher, and entering into the little chapel with his attendant bishop alone, after a short interval of hushed expectation, puts forth, through a round aperture in the wall of the sepulcher, the miraculous fire which is supposed to spring from the tomb. Nothing could be more extraordinary than the aspect of the great area below, upon which we look down from the lofty gallery that surrounds the dome. It is crowded with men, many of them in white tunic and drawers, their upper dress put aside, and everything that would impede them in running. They push, and crowd, and jostle, not to say fight, with arms and legs and lithe bodies, that twist as if there was no bones in them, darting themselvs out and in of the many-colored, seething crowd, which is never still for a moment, to get to the spot nearest the opening.—Blaskwood's Magazine.

Divine Revelations.

The doctrin of divine revelation in the orthodox or mythological sense is fast fading out of the minds and confidence of intelligent people.

By intelligent people is meant those who hav given attention to the principles, the facts, and phenomena of psychology and metaphysics.

The subject of divine revelation is one so serious and mysterious that those who believe in it in this sense accept it so reverently and implicitly that they are often unwilling and unable to reason upon it, to listen to or believe anything calculated to excite a doubt of its reality and reliability.

They believe in it because they hav been taught it, and the testimony of their teachers is all the authority they want; and their misconception of the nature of evidence furnishes them a satisfactory confirmation. A holy bigotry and pious stubbornness are their shield and defense.

They will not reason on the probability or possibility of being deceived in their experiences and their faith respecting it.

They hav no curiosity nor disposition to inquire how human beings first discovered that God made special revelations to his favorit servants. They do not know why it became necessary that he should do it, or how he does it, or anything more, except that he does it, and that is enough.

Religious credulity is the bane of civilized society. Men much rather believe than know; they hav far more confidence in faith than facts, in fables than verified truths.

Men elevated to responsible positions in church and state, as deacons and elders, use their influence to suppress intelligence, stifle investigation, and interpose their official power to arrest the spirit of inquiry. They confess their own ignorance, and also their desire that others should not know more than themselvs and thus discredit their authority.

On the subject of divine revelation, they present with the most solemn gravity their pueril and childish ideas, the nursery lessons of past ages.

Their reasonings are of the feeble order, for the weakest purposes, and they run thus.

Man has five senses, and through them he receives innumerable impressions on the brain; but these impressions are all human, received through the organism. And they constitute animal or human knowledge, which is common to the higher order of the brute creation. These senses, from the environment and the needs of the creature, receive various degrees of development and acuteness. This is manifest in such wonderful extremes that the capacity or aptitude is transmitted from parent to offspring in such perfection, and answers such marvelous purposes, that we cease to credit the power thus exhibited to the exercise of one or more of the senses, but we represent it as something different and superior; in animals we call it instinct or intuition, and in man inspiration or revelation. The olfactory or scenting sense in the dog, the sense of sight and location in the carrier pigeon, and their powers to respond to the revelations of these senses, to most people are nothing short of miracles.

To them the skill of the beaver, the bee, and the ant are also exhibitions of a special, divine impulse or intuition.

We are taught these lessons, and it is easier and safer to believe they are true than it is to doubt or reason upon it.

The facts and knowledge obtained directly through our senses we call human, because we know they are simply impressions on the organism.

But the process by which the mind can use these impressions, analyze, compare, and combine the simple into the complex, and evolve from the elements and principles of the known visions and conceptions of the unknown, we call spiritual. The industrious and careful observer accumulates a vast mass of facts on some special subject. These he arranges into a system or order, and out of them constructs his theories of their origin and uses, and thus makes discoveries or receives revelations beyond his less observant and less critical fellows. By dwelling on his subject, the mind acquires the habit, and without any effort, in unexpected moments, without any special premeditation, new aspects and revelations will burst upon it. The individual having these experiences, his more credulous and superstitious neighbors, not being able to account for them on any scientific principles, ascribe them to a divine agency as special gifts of secret insight. If the subject is religion, then the revelation is a divine inspiration, or a spiritual impression. Such a claim is made for it, and is awarded to it. The neophyte in psychology, or in the science of mind, can account for it in no other way, and seldom will he listen to any other explanation.

The enjoyments of life and the worth of living consist in nervous exhilaration, in the excitation and activity of being; and the mysterious or inexplicable, the indefinable in nature, furnish the topics and texts for that mental knight-errantry to activly employ the imagination and enlist the nervous energies. The field of the unreal and speculativ is without boundary and givs ample range for the most hungry greed in the realms of novelty and adventure. Religion and its mysteries furnish a happy repast for the unsatisfied cravings of a longing nervous vacuity. If while yielding to the reverie, a thought, an idea, a project, a theory or suggestion, should be indulged by the mind, especially if it should seem plausible or practicable, it is straightway a divine visitation and must be heeded. If it should be in any sense new or original that would be an additional voucher of its supernaturalism. Discoveries in the sciences, arts, or inventions may be made by the exercise of natural ingenuity or human reason; or it is thought they may in some obscure or indirect way hav been aided by divine interposition. They being only secular matters, we do not trouble ourselvs much about their origin or whence they come. But visions in morals, metaphysics, schemes for conduct or plans for life involving some special gratification of the ideal, the marvelous, or devotional, we are sure to attribute to the direct action of God upon our minds or feelings. These nursery foibles and fallacies accompany us even with our gray hairs and are carried to the grave. Science, reason, demonstration, are nothing to the one given over to the charm and thraldom of this priestly hallucination—this ancient heathen theology. For its birth was in barbarism—it was cradled in priestcraft, and its fruitage is in modern superstition, strangling the truth and arresting mental progress. How convenient it is to make a God after your own pattern and then enlist him in the service of your own superstitions, and in the suppression of the heresies of those who are laboring to deliver you from spiritual delusion and introduce you to the truth! How comfortable it is to hav a God who understands us, and knows how and when to communicate with us what he wants us to do!

The whole theory and doctrin of the Bible being a divine revelation in any special or proper sense is a forgery and fraud. The Protestant reformers were forced into this flimsy faith when they left the mother church and rejected the pope as the oracle chosen of God for the only channel through which he communicates his will to men. A religion without a divine revelation Luther soon discovered would be a failure, so he seized upon the Bible as the substitute for a pope and insisted it contained the whole revealed will of God. Before that the church held the Bible as a mystery which the people should not read nor believe till its meaning was interpreted or revealed by the church officials, its divinely appointed custodians. Luther maintained the right of private interpretation of the Bible as the entire will of God and succeeded in establishing this faith among Protestants. The reformers were driven to this forgery and fraud when they dispensed with the pope; for the people were too ignorant and superstitious to follow a leader who had not for his guide a divine revelation. The function of religion in those days was not to make men honest, but to make them believers. The success that resulted from this use of the Bible was accepted as ample justification for forging for it a new character. Taking it from the church archives as only a musty relic of ancient literature and giving it preëminence as the "word of God" and a divine revelation, was acting on a long-established church maxim that "the end justifies the means."

The Bible would never hav been known or suspected of being a divine revelation if the priesthood had not invented the idea and vociferously proclaimed it to the ignorant, gaping, credulous multitude, in order to make proselytes.

There never was and never can be but the one principle and method of revelation, and that must be in accordance with fixed law. Call it instinct or intuition, inspiration, impression, or impulse, it never arises to the dignity of a revelation till it is grasped by the understanding and judgment. Nothing is a revelation unless it accords with known facts, or while it is in any sense involved in mystery. A book, a dogma, or a creed may be believed, but it is not a revelation until it is understood. The simplest geometrical formula is a mystery till it is understood, and then it becomes a revelation. We cannot understand God as a personality or a principle; we can therefore hav no revelation from that source. "Who can by searching find out God?" "Oh, the depths of both the wisdom and power of God! how unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out." When our minds are engaged with any subject, whether secular or sacred, it is in vain for us to claim or pretend it is the work of a God. Such claims did for the Dark Ages to subdue and to frighten into submission silly people, but they hav lost their power now, except with the weak, the truculent, and superstitious. They may be learned in books, skilled in the literature, and disciplined in the traditions, yet they are weak and vapory in everything that is sound and substantial in the divine and real.

It is one thing to be smart, flippant, and versatil in the scholasticism of a popular faith; to be voluble and turbulent in defense of a dogma—and quite another thing to be a student of nature and a devotee of truth; to be a patient pupil at the fountain of infinit wisdom, scrutinizing and contesting with rigid analysis every lesson that may be offered for acceptance. It is one thing to be learned in a faith and another thing to be wise in that which is known to be real.

Without revelation we could never get at the truth; with it all mystery and darkness are dispelled, all error dissipated, and the pathway of life made plain and easy. These are its fruits and justly entitle it to the name of divine. All real revelation of nature's mysteries is divine. Whatever tends to disperse the mists of superstition, clear the mind of error, and open it to the light of truth, is a divine revelation. Everything that claims to be divine revelation and does not do this is a fraud and a snare to capture and enslave the unwary and simple-minded. There is much of the latter in the world, and it resembles the "devil transformed into an angel of light" to deceive the very elect. It is intrenched in the pulpit, in the chief seats of the sanctuary, and under the guise of piety and holiness it is captivating the unsuspecting with its glittering illusions and special promises of rewards in this world and the world to come, to all those who accept it.

Yes, divine revelation in its true sense is a verity, and let everyone who seeks the truth wait on it, and receive elsewhere no lessons for authority. It is the source of all truth in divine things. Liv close to it, and wait upon its ministrations and openings. But unless we know how it comes and where we are to look for it, we cannot fail to be deceived by the specious counterfeit which will on every side be offered to us by self-deceived, arrogant worshipers at the shrine of falsehood and delusion. The masses are lured and trammeled by the devoted victims of this ancient, spurious type of so-called divine revelation. Its guise of holiness makes it doubly dangerous.

So far as we accept the true will it deliver us from all error. It will place us on a pinnacle where we can serenely stand, figurativly speaking, in the very presence of God; and we will derive our knowledge from the fountain of all truth, the unimpeachable sources of wisdom. We will hav nothing to fear, nothing to conceal, but everything will be transparent in purity and excellence.

No disguise or affectation, nor assumptions of any kind, will be needed; no titles or honors or places of distinction will be used to giv weight or authority to that which, in itself, is above all human testimony. Nothing factitious or evanescent can add to, or detract from, what stands preëminently above all man's devices in any inferior revelations.

To be morbidly affected with religion, and with that disturbed state of the mind and nervous system which givs rise to vagaries and visions construed into, or supposed to be, divine revelations, correspondingly affects conduct and character. It produces a belief and the disposition that we must depart from ordinary human manners and methods, in our intercourse with society, in doing the newly revealed duty. The belief that God is personally present, and impressing the mind and emotions with these revelations of his will, irresistibly changes the voice, the expression of countenance, the positions of the body, the action of the muscles, the habits of eating and drinking, the quality and mode of the costume, and works a general transformation. Without these changes in the regime—in the moral and personal aspects of life—the individual and others for whom the benefit of the special revelation was supposed to be given, could not be confident of its genuinness and reliability. Such outward signs are believed to be the certain and the invariable accompaniments of a genuin divine revelation of this spurious order. And these revelations would not be accepted by those who believe in them without such external tokens and evidences of their divinity. These spurious revelations can be distinguished from the real and true by always being thus verified, while the latter never are by anything of the kind, as they need no outward confirmation, having within themselvs those inherent qualities and properties that carry with them irresistible evidence, and which are all-sufficient.

Let his mistakes or failings be what they may, the true revelations that Jesus made to his disciples in Judea, according to the record, were without these outward signs and personal airs that accompany the false. His religious neighbors, the Pharisees, like many of the same kind among us here, would not credit his testimony as divine revelations, because of the absence of these signs. But he said "a wicked and an adulterous generation should hav no sign." They should place their evidence on a higher basis—their own powers of discernment. "Why even of yourselvs judge ye not what is right?"

He was severe on the Pharisees for parading these external signs in their long prayers, their disfigured countenances, broad phylacteries, and other methods of showing their communion with God.

It is very clear, from the direct and positiv style and language of Jesus, that neither his tones nor manners were either pious or affected, or bore any other evidence of this spurious divinity.

Among the radical reformers of the past George Fox was entirely free from them. He was so exemplary in that respect, so determined not to mislead, or deceive by these false outward signs of piety and professions of religion, that his contemporary biographer made special mention of it as one of his exceptional virtues, and of his aversion to those outward, whining, priestly tones, airs, and devices assumed by those who claim to be under a divine special guidance and revelation.

Almost everywhere among high professors of religion, who claim to liv in intimacy with God, we see these ghostly airs assumed, for the sole purpose of the parties to pass, through these fraudulent means, for what they are not, and for deceiving the people. T. E. LONGSHORE.

Bruno.

[In September last year Mr. C. Bradlaugh lectured in Nottingham, taking for his subject, "Bruno: 1600–1889." Since Mr. Bradlaugh's departure the Catholics hav been busy denouncing Bruno from their pulpits. I sent to Canon Harnett the letter appended in answer to one sent by him to one of our local papers. I do not claim for it any special literary merit, but send it hoping it may interest some of your readers. The name of Bruno has a special claim on the sympathies of all Freethinkers.—R. J. M.]

SIR: While hunting up some information in some back issues of the Guardian, I came across a letter of yours on the above subject. The paper bears the date of Oct. 1, 1889, nine months ago. As one who has lectured from the same platform as Mr. Bradlaugh, and as one who has "held up Bruno to admiration," I ask leave to plead on behalf of this dead Freethinker. My only apology for addressing you is (if one is needed), Bruno was a heretic, and I share his heresy.

"Implacable hatred of the Catholic church, and of its visible head on earth, is the main idea of these men in holding up Bruno to admiration." As far as I am personally concerned, your words are true. I hav no love for your church. Why should I hav? What has your church done for me or mine? Gazing backward through "the portals of history," what has your church done for humanity? Instead of "wicked men" "inflicting a lasting insult to Christianity," has not Christianity, as personified by your church, offered a lasting insult to the human race? You invite "anyone" to read Berti's work; let me invite you to read another—Rule's History of the Inquisition. Compare, I pray you, the life of Roderic Borgia, Pope Alexander VI., with that of Bruno of Nola, and tell me candidly which of the two you consider the most "infamous," the most "foul and full of obscenities?"

It is quite true, as you say, that Bruno made "a direct assault on the Christian religion." That assault has continued ever since. I glory in it. And I trust the unveiling of a statue to Bruno is not regarded as "a mere barren act of homage, but as the beginning of a new period of agitation, which shall rouse the popular classes against the church of Rome." And one of the strongest opponents your church has to face in this country is the man you oppose in the columns of a daily paper, not having the courage to oppose him on the platform.

You say it is not true that the Inquisition was hunting for him, because he had many towns, like Geneva, where he might hav lived in peace. Do you not know that there are Inquisitions and Inquisitors, of a milder kind, in other creeds besides that of the holy Catholic church? Inquisitors to-day dare not burn, but they still rob men of their liberty; others they try to ruin; some they try to rob of their children, and sometimes succeed; and in places where Christian toleration makes Freethought unsafe, some may lose the means by which they gain their daily bread. Bruno did go to Geneva. Geneva offered him a cloak, sword, and bread, and intellectual imprisonment for life. Bruno looked at the glorious Alps, and thought of the sweets of liberty. Choosing liberty to servitude, he left the home of Calvin, the murderer of Servetus. To say he might hav lived there in peace is only partly true. Bruno might hav lived there in peace if he had no opinions of his own. He knew how to value thought, and knew how to die for it.

"Whatever punishment the state passed upon him, and it is not at all clear what it was," we should remember heavy penalties were enacted for slight crimes. How innocent! For the word "state" substitute the words "Catholic church." The punishment, as you know, was years of imprisonment and death by burning in the Campo di Fiori. If you do not know these facts, how do you fill up the void in Bruno's life between May 23, 1592, and the 17th February, 1600? If you did know these facts, what do you mean by stating it is not at all clear what his punishment was? Is not imprisonment and death by burning punishment? If not, what is it?

"Bruno appears to hav been an apostate, a blasphemer, and an avowed pantheist." Sir, the predominating characteristic of your church is bigotry—bigotry of the worst kind. Whenever men hav been grand enough to think for themselvs, and bold enough to honestly teach what they hav thought, your church has always been ready to call these men blasphemers. If these "blasphemers" belonged to your church, and dared to think for themselvs, you label them "apostates," as though they were not as honest in their thought as you are. The blasphemy of Bruno's life was his pantheism. That was his real crime against the Catholic church. The Catholic church has always hated a thinker on precisely the same lines as a burglar hates a policeman.

Now I hav done, unless you care to send this, with your answer, to the public press.

Eminent Women.

LUCRETIA MOTT.

When the excitement of antislavery meetings and conventions was about at the highest stage, I remember well seeing the mild, beautiful face of Lucretia Mott at some of these meetings at Pleasant Valley, N. Y.

It was a face which, once seen, could never be forgotten. I see her this morning just as I saw her then, and hear the low, gentle, earnest tones of her voice, as it always spoke for freedom, kindliness, and reform.

But in writing of her, I draw, not from memory, but from Mrs. E. C. Stanton's memorial address of her, delivered in Washington, in 1881.

In January, 1793, the little island of Nantucket "welcomed to its solitude a child destined to be one of America's most famous women," Lucretia Mott.

In 1708, Mary Starbuck, the "Great Merchant," a woman of remarkable intellect and executiv ability, "converted the colony [at Nantucket] to Quakerism, and vindicated woman's right to interest herself in the commerce of the world. Perhaps she, like the good genii of old, brought her gifts to that cradle and breathed into the new life the lofty inspiration that made this woman the prophet and seer she was. Here were the descendants of John Wolman, William Rotch, George Fox, the Macys, the Franklins, the Folgers; and in this pure atmosphere, and from these distinguished ancestors, Lucretia Mott received her inheritance. Her father was an honest seafaring Quaker; her mother belonged to the Folger family, whose culture, genius, common sense, and thrift culminated in Benjamin Franklin, and later in Lucretia Mott." So here again we see the mother-heredity producing the grand and noble offspring. Lucretia says in her diary: "I hav always loved the good in childhood, and desired to do the right. In those early years, I was activly useful to my mother, who, in the absence of my father on his long voyages, was engaged in mercantil business, often going to Boston to purchase goods in exchange for oil and candles, the staple of the island. The exercise of women's talents in this line, as well as the general care which devolved upon them in the absence of their husbands, tended to develop them mentally and physically."

In 1804 the family moved to Boston, where Lucretia was sent to the public instead of the select schools, as in the latter the pride of class might be engendered.

Mingling with the poor, and noting their patient struggles with poverty, gave her a feeling of sympathy for the masses, which grew and increased in all the after years of her life.

Her father lost his property by indorsing for a friend. He never recovered from the blow, and the support of the family henceforth mainly devolved on the mother, who was energetic, ambitious, and courageous.

The parents, like all Quakers, felt that a good education was the best blessing they could bestow on their children, and in her fourteenth year Lucretia and her elder sister were sent to "The Nine Partners," a Quaker boarding-school in Duchess county, N. Y.

At fifteen she became assistant teacher, and at the end of the second year was offered the situation of teacher, with the inducement of entitling a younger sister to her education. Lucretia had her share of life's trials. "As one of eight children in her father's house, with his financial embarrassments and sudden death, and afterward with five children of her own, and her husband's reverses, Lucretia's heroism and strength of mind were fairly tested. In both of these financial emergencies she opened a school, and by her success as a teacher bridged over the chasm."

In her eighteenth year she married James Mott, whose acquaintance she had formed at the boarding school, and for half a century they enjoyed a true and congenial companionship. He had the cool judgment, she the enkindling enthusiasm; he had the slow, sure movement, she the quick, impulsiv energy. He enjoyed nothing more than silence, she nothing more than talking. The one was completely the complement of the other.

Collyer says theirs was the most perfect wedded life to be found on earth.

They were both of a beautiful presence—he large, fair, with kindly blue eyes and regular features; she slight, with dark hair and eyes. Both of the sunniest spirit—both free to take their own way, as such fine souls always are, and yet their lives were so perfectly one that neither of them led or followed the other, so far as one could observe, by the breadth of a line.

In his young days James Mott was a teacher. He then engaged in the cotton business, but dropped it just as it was becoming profitable, because it was connected with slave labor. Then he took up the wool business, which proved financially successful, so that he retired on a competency, which enabled them to take a trip to Europe, and afterward to liv a life of leisure indulging in literary pursuits.

Lucretia was a good housekeeper and took the entire charge of her children. She did not rest content in simply caring for home, but filled and rounded out her life by riding, study, and activ work in all kinds of reform.

Glancing at the platform on one occasion in Philadelphia, the central figure is Lucretia Mott in Quaker costume, in the zenith of her refined beauty. Around her are grouped James Mott, William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Thomas W. Higginson, Robert Purvis, Charles Burleigh, Ernestine L. Rose, Frances Dana Gage, Hannah Tracy Cutler, Lydia Mott, Martha C. Wright, Ann Austin, Sarah Pugh, Hannah Darlington, Mary Grew, Matilda Joslyn Gage, Susan B. Anthony, and Lucy Stone, as refined and remarkable an assembly of men and women as would be found in any European court. Yet these were the people so hated and ridiculed by the press and pulpit, whose grand utterances and spicy debates were stigmatized as the "maudlin sentimentalism of unsexed men and women."

Look at these names now and see what time has done for their redemption, and take heart all ye who are at this day maligned, ostracised, fined, and imprisoned for being in advance of your age and giving your best thoughts to the world.

As a minister in Quaker meeting Lucretia had her crosses to endure—crosses as heavy as now fall on the heads and hearts of the pioneers of to day. Her motto was, "Truth for authority rather than authority for truth." She says, "The doctrin of original sin never commended itself to my reason or conscience, except on the theory of original holiness also." She was thoroughly optimistic, believing in a love of the good, the true, and the beautiful as the ruling motivs of the majority of life's children.

Though to her heart's core she was a Hicksite Quaker and a true expounder of the tenets of Elias Hicks, yet she was feared, traduced, maligned, and dreaded as a thorn in the flesh among the followers of his doctrins, just as a real Christian is now feared and maligned if he attempts to preach the real Christ—as a man and a reformer, instead of a ranting and dogmatic fanatic.

One of the best preachers they had, but so identified with popular, or rather unpopular reforms, they would hav given much to hav had her expelled from membership, "but she understood her own rights and the Friends' disciplin too well to violate a single rule. Although her enemies kept close watch, they never caught her off her guard."

When the Friends split into Hicksite and orthodox, and she saw the cold, averted looks of "those whose confidence she once enjoyed, and was shunned as unworthy of notice," she said, "all this was hard to endure, but it was the price I paid for being true to the convictions of my own soul."

Collyer says of her speaking, "There was not the least hint of premeditation, while there was a boundless wealth of meditation, in her deep, pregnant thoughts," thus proving that inspiration, eloquence, and impromptu speaking come from deep study, a full mind, and carefully digested convictions. She was always ready, prompt, and quick to act.

When Garrison wrote the declaration of antislavery, and the members were asked to sign, James Mott stood by the desk. Thomas Shipley said that "before signing it would be well to consider, as it would bring down on their heads terrible persecutions, and great losses in their business relations. He said he should sign it himself, but advised James Mott and others to pause. The moment Shipley ceased speaking, Lucretia, in a brave, inspiring tone, said, 'James, put down thy name,' which he quickly did, joining in the general smile of satisfaction. At a social gathering one evening Dr. Moore was conversing with her, strongly condemning the fanaticism and impolicy of the Abolitionists, and especially the women. He finally became too insulting for the gentle, Quakerly woman, and she arose in indignation, and as she left him she remarked, "All I hav to say to thee in parting is, 'Get thee behind me, Satan.'" He quietly took his hat and departed.

NOTWITHSTANDING the enormous quantity of books, how few people read! But if they read, and read with advantage, should we hav to witness the deplorable infatuations to which the vulgar are still every day a prey?—Voltaire.

Mr. G. A. Chapin's Twelve Questions.

1. What evidence hav we of any God?

Answer. If by the term "God" the writer means an absolute personality, the first cause of all things, I reply, None. But if he means by "God" the "universal energy" or activity, I reply we hav no evidence of its nature, and are only conscious of its manifestations. Nature never manifests any of those qualities which are distinctivly human.

2. What evidence hav we of immortality?

Ans. If immortality means conscious existence after the dissolution of the physical organism I reply, None. The question involves two problems, viz.: First. Is man a unity or a duality? Second. Where is the locality of immortal residence? To the first I reply that science has found man to be a living organism, and that when he is dead he has ceased to liv, and not that "life has gone out of him." To the second I reply that the heavens (or the space so-called) is being pretty well searched by astronomers, and no doubt when this locality is found due mention will be made of the fact.

3. What authority can one man rightfully hav over another?

Ans. The authority arising from superior mental ability and larger experience. Huxley and Darwin speak with that authority which comes from intimate knowledge of their special branches of science.

4. How is the rule of a majority any less destructiv to freedom than the rule of a monarch?

Ans. The term "freedom" is susceptible of different meanings in different countries, and under different circumstances. The rule of the majority is less destructiv, because the rights of the minority are not so liable to be overlooked.

5. What right does man hav to what he does not earn?

Ans. The question is peculiarly stated. The words "right" and "earn" are too loosely used to admit of a clear answer. The "right" may depend upon the uses to which he puts his earnings, and his possessions may come not from his own immediate exertions, but from the exertions which others hav been enabled to make consequent upon his former exertions. An answer is possible when these two terms are defined.

6. What right has any man to hold vacant land out of use?

Ans. None, in the strict sense of the word. If his intentions are to use it, a reasonable time should be allowed him to develop his plans.

7. What right does one man or combination of men hav to monopolize the issue of money?

Ans. The right which comes from a general recognition of its currency. Money is only a measure of value. A dollar bill is a promis to pay. So long as the issuer is known to be solvent it is a dollar. A check or bank draft is of the same character. Every man has a right to issue his own money—check or draft—so long as he can giv its equivalent in wealth when called upon to do so.

8. On what grounds can compulsory taxation be enforced?

Ans. 1. Public necessity. 2. The desire on the part of some to escape the obligations incidental to social life.

9. Are interest, rent, and profits earned by the receivers?

Ans. Sometimes.

10. Can they be collected without force?

Ans. Yes, when men are faithful to their undertakings.

11. What right has a policeman to use force?

Ans. When he is resisted in the discharge of his duty. His force is derived. He represents the healthy portion of the community, and will be a necessity so long as the brute nature continues in man. When men acknowledge in their conduct that one man's rights are limited by the rights of another a policeman will be an extinct species.

12. What right has any man or body of men to interfere with the absolute individual freedom of the human race?

Ans. In our present stage of civilization absolute individual freedom cannot exist. Absolutism would be despotism. Human beings are too interdependent to permit of such a condition. Society must protect itself; it is only possible where individuals subordinate themselvs to the well-being of the mass.

Brooklyn, N. Y. HENRY ROWLEY.

The All-Father's Pets.

If the earth was created by an all-wise deity who loves the gentle and guards the good, how is it that, in the struggle for existence, these always become the prey of the crafty, the cruel, and the strong? In the vegetable kingdom those plants most beautiful or useful to man are easiest injured. The early frost destroys the flowers and corn, but weeds unsightly and worthless flourish as before. The mangled lily dies, but the trampled thistle springs up again to send its seed afar on every breeze.

Our useful plants require careful protection and cultivation; left to themselvs they would degenerate into worthless forms, or perish utterly. They hav been created by the persevering intelligence of man —are the enemies of nature, which always seeks to destroy them and giv their room to weeds and brambles. The all-father then has given injurious and worthless plants an advantage over all the useful and beautiful ones in the struggle for existence!

In the animal world it is not the nightingale or oriole, the lamb or the new-born babe, that nature loves the best, but the serpent with its poison fang and the bird of prey with cruel claws. The wild fawn must hav food or die; the cobra can fast a year and hav strength left to kill the noblest man in India. A pure, fair young Italian girl is struggling in the arms of the robber chief; her whole life has been devoted to the service of God and saint; her prayers and tears should hav power to move the father's heart, but he is dumb and cold as the mountain crags, and lying there upon the Alpine daisies, dishonored and murdered, she is food for wolves and vultures. Half a century later the bandit devil receives the last rites and consolations of holy church, dies peacefully in his bed, and is buried under the pines upon the mountain side, and the daisies spring up and cover his grave with perfumed snow. Items of Foreign Freethought News.

That our readers may hav an idea of the work done in behalf of Mental Liberty, we can inform them that during the past year the secretary of the German Freethought Association mailed 2,068 letters, 1,208 postal cards, and 10,204 packages of printed matter. Do we need better proof of the gradual awakening of the people to the danger of submitting to the dictates of a tyrannical priesthood?———Dr. Voelkel, lecturer and editor of the Frei-religiöses Sonntagsblatt, is at present treating the German Liberals in various cities to a lecture on Thomas Paine. The audiences of our friend are surprisingly large to an American; gatherings of four to six hundred are very common. We see but one reason for the difference in size between German and American audiences: the Germans are not afraid of announcing themselvs as Liberals, while the Americans, well—that almighty dollar, and still more almighty clergy. Let us be ashamed of ourselvs.

A correspondent to the Parisian paper XIX Siècle (Nineteenth Century) writes that the governor of Kurland has published the following order:

Whereas the Jews are not Christians; they liv in darkness and do not know the light of the Christian religion. It is therefore right that the Jews should pay all the costs of lighting and the gas bills for the cities of Mitau, Liban, Windou, etc., that they on their part may 'enlighten' the Christians. Resolved, that hoeneforward all the costs of the lighting of the above-named cities be borne by the Jews living therein." Commenting upon this the Milwaukee Freidenker says, "This is Russian justice and Russian Christianity." What about the American Christian justice in taxing Freethinkers for the support of churches? Brother C. H. Boppe might fitly hav remarked.

In Italy Prime Minister Crispi has scored a great victory. July 3d, the Italian senate by an overwhelming majority indorsed the transference to state administration of Opere Pie, the charitable funds whose handling has heretofore so benefited the clergy. Poor litt'e pope, his protest of June 26th addressed to the senate, was of no avail.

July 8th, Viktor E. Lennstrand was for the fifth time declared not guilty of blasphemy by a jury; hence both he and Mr. Wilhelmson, the publisher, hav escaped the clutches of the clergy this time. We congratulate our friends. One would think that this time the Swedish government ought to realize what the public sentiment is, and that its previous "Christian" conduct only makes it an object for the contempt and laughter of the intelligent part of mankind. Mr. Lennstrand announces that the yearly congress of Swedish Freethinkers will be held in Stockholm, August 9th and 10th, and that he will take the warpath immediately after. We expect some noise then in the orthodox camp.———Henry V. Berghell, who is indicted for blasphemy in Jönköping, is getting "Christian experiences." A witness for the prosecution testified under oath in the court that he had taken down notes of M. Berghell's lecture and that these notes would clearly prove the wickedness of the defendant. Mr. Heywood's Case.*

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Since July 2d, when I received from Mr. Searle the rather startling news that Judge Carpenter had overruled all exceptions, violated law and customs, in denying me appeal and rehearing before two judges, and that I was called for sentence the next day, at 11 A.M., unpleasant suspense has not been encouraging. It recalls days of my childhood, when my father, Ezra Hoar, a devout Baptist, at evening family service used to lead in singing:

> The day is past and gone,
> The evening shades appear:
> Oh, may we all remember well,
> The night of death draws near.

I knew somewhat of the rigor of even liberal jails—how easily they can take life, as well as health and cheer, in those living tombs, where, as I write this, millions of human beings, no worse than you and I, Mr. Editor, are under legalized torture; hence the outlook of five years in prison, which Judge Carpenter, to-morrow, will probably consider a "light sentence," is not attractiv. I hav had the ablest defense lawyers could render. J. F. Pickering, my senior counsel in the case of 1877–8, and in the case of 1882–3, gave valuable advice. George W. Searle is one of the best criminal lawyers in Boston, a life-long student in literary and reformatory fields, alert, adroit, cogent, and tireless in behalf of whomsoever he acts for in court. Without detracting from the great services rendered by Pickering, Wakeman, Park, Cobb, and many other good lawyers in previous cases, it is due to Mr. Chamberlain to say that he is the best-posted lawyer in these states on obscenity cases—a clear-headed, able, ready defender of Personal Rights by tongue or pen, wherever they are assailed. With him reform is no matter of pretense or cant, but work, needing to be done regardless of personal cost to himself or others. The conspicuous ability, scholarly accomplishment, and timely service he incarnated in Mrs. Slenker's case, before Judge Paul, at Abingdon, Va., will not soon be forgotten by Freethinkers, or others who hav at heart the good of human beings or the imperativ need of progressiv work.

Since Saturday evening, May 10th, when Arresting Officer McCauseland took me from Princeton depot swiftly back to Boston, and put me in the court-house cellar, which they dignify as the "city prison," many ludicrous, as well as tragic, events hav transpired which I cannot now, amid pressing trials in the few hours of liberty left me, even allude to. The transient frenzy to "suppress" dissenters from Christian law and order, which just now obsesses some district attorneys and judges, has no popular approval. All this comes about here, as Mr. Harman's fate in Kansas, by the activity of the mercenary nests of Vice Society vipers in New York, Boston, and St. Louis, of which Comstock, Chase, and McAfee are the "agent" reptils. For the first time in seventeen years Christian decoy has a president, Harrison; a postmaster-general, Wanamaker, and a postmaster in Princeton, Deacon Gregory—three pious men, willing servants of his obscenityship, Anthony Comstock. Without law, and against law, Wanamaker "ordered" Deacon Gregory to deceive me, lie to me, in order to get possession of publications to be used to compass my imprisonment. Will Wanamaker's "order" to local postmasters to deceive and lie for morality's sake and Christ's sake be accepted as law by the American people? is the rather serious question now confronting citizens. Judge Carpenter accepted that "order" as law, and thereby secured my conviction. United States District-Attorney Frank D. Allen so far lacks mind of his own that he tells Mr. Searle he can't allow us the usual appeal hitherto assured by law and custom in the United States Circuit Court, because the authorities at Washington "impetuously urge him to hav me speedily sentenced." Judge Carpenter is an intense Methodist; frequents dog-fights, prize-fights; is of a light and frivolous strain; knows little of, and cares less for, the grand issues involved in these cases. No doubt he is obtusely, vulgarly "honest;" that it seems to him right to do what he has power to do with the victims of his "pure" vengeance, but an "honest" knave is quite as difficult a thing to reason with as a tricky fool. So Mr. Chamberlain very properly thinks it not worth while for him to come to Boston to attempt further argument before Judge Carpenter, who is to sit alone to-morrow, to decide the case. Whether Mr. Searle or I can let daylight of truth and reason into his densely dark mind is a question.

Before going behind prison bars again (being taken, rather, for I do not arrest, try, or jail myself), allow me to refer to two or three of my critics. In

* Mr. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, being absent on a fortnight's vacation, editorial opinion on Mr. Heywood's case is deferred till his return.—ED. pro tem.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th Converse Close says of Harman, Reid, and me: "Those men, each and all, hav promulgated theories and engaged in practices contrary to law." This statement is false, every word of it; we hav simply urged amendments of present imperfect institutions and customs. The guarantees of religious liberty in our state and federal constitutions include moral liberty, which is a part of religious freedom, and hence included in it. Mr. Close quotes the statement of ideas kept standing at the head of the editorial column in the Word, adding: "This paper is a labor-union, Anarchistic publication, and advocates what it considers Liberal Freethought principles." Is it not my legal right to do so? Has Mr. Close got so far into perfect society, the millennium, that no further discovery or utterance of truth is necessary or "legal?" The Declaration of Independence affirms the right of citizens to alter or abolish government if they think best to try. Messrs. Reid and Harman are imprisoned for no real offense; they were exercising their legal natural right to deal with others as was mutually agreeable; the "crime" for which they suffer torture is purely fictitious; nobody is invaded, nobody hurt; it is nobody's business what our thoughts, words, or actions are if there is no overt act harming others' persons or property. Mr. Close ought to hav sense enough to be ashamed to side with the Christian scamps who imprison us. What I mean by wordocracy (of which Mr. Close quotes the proclamation) is just what Paine and Jefferson meant by democracy; what Garrison meant in demanding "Liberty for each, for all, and for ever;" what Andrews meant in the Pantarchy; what Proudhon meant by Anarchy; what Josiah Warren meant by "True civilization." Does Mr. Close really think growth, progress, disorderly or illegal? If so, so much the worse for his law and order.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 5th, you said: "We hope Mr. Heywood will get clear of the inquisition and then reform." I favor evolution in morals, physiology, and language, express opinions and print others' opinions; supposing you do differ from me, is not that your right? Is not my right to speak to others who choose to listen—to giv or sell a paper to others who wish to read—strictly legal? Hav I invaded, hurt anybody? If not, wherein do I need to "reform?"

In Liberty, some time ago, Benj. R. Tucker wrote of my "seeming determination to outdo Harman in rashness." E. C. Walker, in Fair Play, says I heedlessly "rush upon the naked sword of an athlete," "deliberately walk into the enemy's stronghold, and stretch myself upon its racks." Geo. E. Macdonald says in Freethought: "Mr. Heywood appears to hav voluntarily placed his head in the lion's mouth, or rather laid it at the ass's heels." When their work was being done some said Garrison and John Brown were "rash," "foolish," "crazy," but intelligent sense now sees in them pioneer exponents of natural law and order. Bacon (not H. S. Bacon, the unterrified Democrat who takes THE TRUTH SEEKER in Worcester, Mass., but the old Bacon who was Shakspere) said, "He who hath a wife and children has given pledges to fortune," cannot act freely. Perhaps Mr. Tucker's hesitancy is due to the fact that he has a baby; its name is "Anarchy," and a very bright and worthy child it is. But in personating Freethought I enact Anarchy in its best sense, as Mr. Tucker's child will concede, if it livs to grow up. Mr. Walker seems to think his baby, "Autonomy," is endangered by one outspoken newspaper in Massachusetts; that bravado, not sense, animates me. Wait and see, please. Whether I come out of prison alive, physically, or not, I will not commit moral suicide by suppressing my thought relativ to soul and body issues up for consideration. If Mr. Tucker's or Mr. Walker's church is liable to be upset by printed Freethought in the Word, or elsewhere, it is weaker built than I supposed. Our royal George shall reply to himself:

When there is general doubt about the thickness of the ice the man who goes ahead and tests it is regarded as a useful person if he finds it safe, and a fool if he breaks through and gets drowned. We are ignorant of the amount of liberty we may enjoy until we feel about us and find how light the bonds are; but we can safely risk our last dollar on the proposition that we will never hav any more than we reach out and take. The blessed "people" represented by the church and state are not in the habit of extending favors to us in the form of new liberties. If Mr. Harman had not published the Markland letter, Mr. Tucker or I might hav done it and got five years in the penitentiary. His act costs Mr. Tucker and me nothing, but knowledge of it is worth as much to us as to him. Heywood's "Cupid's Yokes" taught us the same lesson free of cost to ourselvs. So I feel a certain sense of gratitude to these pioneers.—Freethought.

We hav published books and a newspaper here now nearly twenty years. You and I, Mr. Editor, differ in ideas and style of expression; but the right of each to do his own work in his own way is unquestionable. It is only lack of faith in truth and human nature that thinks plain-spoken intelligence unsafe. What newspaper act ever did more for journalistic progress and civilizing, Anarchistic growth than Bennett's, when he came home from the Watkins convention, where he, Bell, Tilton, and another were raided for selling "Cupid's Yokes," and said in THE TRUTH SEEKER that he would sell, deliver in hand, or mail the book?

We need more "cranks," more "rash" assertion of right denied. Dr. Franklin said, "Where liberty is, there is my country." Let us better the instruction, saying where liberty is not, there we will work to realize it.

But time flies, and this, probably my "last will and testament" to you for some time hence, must close. Though there are seeming defeats, yet Bunker Hill leads to Yorktown, Harper's Ferry to negro emancipation; "light afflictions" come now and then, but, in the long run, liberty is synonymous with victory. Twelve years ago "the heathen raged" more hotly against "Cupid's Yokes" than now against the Word. Did they suppress my book? They advertised it. So now, whatever becomes of me, personally, the truth we work to realize will win, and all will be the better for it. Guizot, the French historian, said, "A man never rises so high as when he cannot tell where he is going;" we all march "under sealed orders," often walk off precipices, but though in faith our steps "fall on seeming void," in fact we find "the solid rock" beneath inquiring feet.

In August, 1878, when H. L. Green welcomed the Freethought hosts to Watkins Glen, honoring Christian speakers by extending to them the cordial hospitality of a free platform, and giving them the critical attention of intelligent listeners, Christian spies skulked about, and got under arrest and held for trial four Freethinkers for selling my book. On his way home J. P. Mendum, the brave old publisher of the Boston Investigator, called at the Hotel Dedham, where I was then a United States guest, and told me the stunning news. Was Bennett frightened? Rather, he rose in righteous wrath to the level of brave, wise, timely action, for which millions are now grateful. Burke said, "A contented slave is a demoralized man." I don't see how citizens can sleep nights under the revolting, infamous censorship of opinions now imposed by Comstock, Wanamaker & Co. In Irish phrase, I for one "will not be satisfied unless I am dissatisfied" with the foul despotism dominant in obscenity statutes. Those not in prison for protesting, I fear, hav not done their duty. Thanking you, Mr. Editor, for the generous space given in your columns to these pregnantly important and intensely interesting questions, and rejoicing in your steadfast devotion to mental freedom, I am yours for the right and power to know something about physiology, morals, language, and yet be permitted to liv outside of jails.

EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

Princeton, Mass., July 23, Y.L. 18.

BOSTON, 3 P.M., July 24, Y.L. 18.

MR. EDITOR: Searle did admirably; the case could not hav been better presented. But the sentence is two years at hard labor in the state prison. If the government can afford it I and mine can afford it. Banished from his home city Dante asked, "If I go who remains?" Well, Mr. Editor, there are hosts of protesting citizens outside. I go behind bars knowing that right has been discerned and duty done by me and mine in behalf of citizen Freedom invaded, and trust Mrs. Heywood and children, all workers for right, the Word and the cause they bespeak, will hav the coöperativ support that liberty, struck down but not dismayed, deserves.

Yours truly, E. H. HEYWOOD.

From the Boston Daily Globe of July 25th.

Ezra H. Heywood, publisher of the Princeton Word, who was convicted of sending obscene literature through the mails, was sentenced yesterday in the circuit court by Judge Carpenter to two years at hard labor in Charlestown state prison.

Such a scene as that which immediately preceded the imposition of this sentence is seldom seen in Boston. Confusion reigned supreme and the assistance of marshals was needed to quell the disturbance.

A lengthy bill of exceptions was put in by defendant's counsel, asking for a new trial and for an arrest of judgment. The court refused to admit the exceptions or to grant the motions for a new trial or for an arrest of judgment.

The court was just asking for instructions regarding the punishment in such cases, when, seeing Mr. Heywood arising to his feet, the court asked if he had anything to say regarding the severity of sentence.

Mrs. Josephine S. Tilton, sister of Mrs. Heywood, who until now had been a quiet though earnest listener of the proceedings, arose to her feet and exclaimed: "Men of Massachusetts, are you going to permit and countenance a court that does not giv justice, and that does not countenance liberty?"

The marshals interfered here, and Mr. Heywood, who meantime was upon his feet, declared his innocence of immorality, said he had been decoyed into a trap by United States officials, and that the whole performance was a montrous piece of injustice.

The court said that no further remarks need be made on that subject, as that question had already been decided upon by a jury.

Mrs. Heywood, wife of the accused, asked to be allowed to say a word but was refused.

Mr. Heywood's only remark was that he was not there to plead for mercy.

He was then sentenced to Charlestown prison for two years at hard labor.

Initiation of Organs.

Professor Romanes in the Nineteenth Century has the following refutation of certain arguments of the pious against the development of organs by evolution:

I suppose there are few structures in the animal kingdom so remarkable in respect of adaptation as the wing of a bird or a bat; and at first sight it might well appear that a wing could be of no conceivable use until it had already acquired enormous proportional dimensions, as well as an immense amount of special elaboration with respect to general form, size of muscle, amount of blood supply, and so on. For, obviously, not until it had attained all these things could it begin to raise the animal in the air. But now, observe how fallacious is this argument. Although it is perfectly true that a wing could be of no use as a wing until sufficiently developed to serve the purposes of flight, this is merely to say that until it has become a wing it is of no use as a wing. But it does not follow, "as a matter of necessity," that it was of no use for any other purpose. The first modifications of the fore limb, which ended in its becoming an organ of flight, may very well hav been due to adopting it as an organ for increasing rapidity of locomotion of other kinds—whether on land, as in the case of its now degenerated form in the ostrich, or in water, as in the case of the greatly expanded pectoral fins of the so-called flying-fish. Moreover, in the so-called flying squirrels, we find the limbs united to the body by means of large extensions of the skin, so that when jumping from one tree to another the animal is able to sustain itself through a long distance in the air by merely spreading out its limbs after the manner of a parachute. Here, of course, we hav not yet got a true wing, any more than we hav in the case of the flying fish, but we hav the foundations laid for the possible development of a future wing somewhat upon the pattern which has been so wonderfully perfected in the wing of a bat. And through all the stages of progressiv expansion which the skin of the squirrel (or the fin of the flying fish) has undergone the expansion has been of use, even though as yet the organ has not so much as begun to acquire the distinctiv functions of a wing. Here, then, there is obviously nothing "prophetic" in the matter, any more than there was in the case of the swim-bladder and the lung, or in that of the nerve-ending and the eye.

Hardly a Case in Point.

From the Boston Transcript.

There was a funny incident out in one of our intellectual suburbs, which did not go far to help the Christian Science doctrin. The occurrence was in this wise: A prominent expositress of the doctrin of Christian Science was invited by a number of ladies in one of the suburbs who had become interested in these doctrins and wanted an authoritativ exposition of them, to come out and talk on the subject. She came, and began her address in a small lecture room.

"Ladies," she said, "I wish to impress upon your minds the fact that nothing exists as it appears to us to exist. All matter is unreal; it is a delusion, a hallucination. Nothing is matter—all is mind. And this truth does not apply merely to what is called disease and its phenomena. The more ordinary things about us are as much hallucinations as so-called disease. I will giv an illustration.

"Yesterday I was engaged in housework, and I had occasion to cut up and prepare a number of quinces. Now, you all know how terribly quinces are supposed to stain and blacken the hands. For days and days, under the old thought, I hav worn upon my fingers the dark stains made by paring quinces. Well, as I worked over these quinces yesterday, paring, quartering, handling them, I thought, 'How foolish, now, to suppose that these unreal, unsubstantial, nonexisting things should stain my hands!' and I resolved that they should not stain my hands, and that I would not look at my fingers until my work was over and then would find them perfectly clean. Well, ladies, not alone did I pare and quarter these quinces, but after I had completed them I had occasion to cut and prepare a number of tomatoes, and you know how dreadful they are supposed to be. I pared my tomatoes, cut them and sliced them, handling them freely all the time; when I was all done with both I rinsed my hands and looked at them, and they were perfectly clean and white, and not a stain upon them."

When the "Scientist" had reached the stage of the tomatoes the women of the audience began to look wonderingly and significantly at one another, and when she announced the miracle handkerchiefs were stuffed into mouths all over the little hall, and chests were heaving with suppressed laughter. Being in considerable part housewives, the ladies knew that in the nature of mere material things the juice of tomatoes will wash away and utterly remove the stain of any other fruit whatsoever, and after cutting up tomatoes, not a vestige of the quince stain could hav been left upon the woman's hands, Christian Science or no Christian Science.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Spiritualists of southwestern Michigan will hold a ten days' camp-meeting on the public park, South Haven, Mich., August 8th to 18th. Among the speakers engaged are Hon. L. V. Moulton, of Grand Rapids; Moses and Mattie Hull, of Chicago, and Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, of South Haven. There will be music by Professor Davis, the Harris twin sisters, and others. All are invited. Each must provide his own tent; board can be had near by. Season tickets, fifty cents; or ten cents each day.

W. F. JAMIESON gave a lecture Sunday evening, July 13th, in Bowen's Grove, near New Hartford, Ia., and three lectures in Colesburg, Ia., July 18th, 19th, and 20th. He is arranging for several lectures and debates in Minnesota, at Kasson, Byron, Plainview, and Princeton. Liberals living near those points can address him at Des Moines, Ia. Mr. Jamieson and Elder L. T. Nichols, of Claremont, Minn., will conduct a joint oral debate of eight nights in Kasson, Minn. The points of debate are: 1. The Bible is wholly of human origin, and abounds in contradictory, immoral, absurd, and inconsistent teachings. This will be affirmed by Jamieson the first four nights. 2. The teachings of the New Testament are all moral and elevating. Nichols affirms the next four nights. The elder writes as if he is eager to show how little ground the Freethinker has to deny the Bible. Mr. Jamieson has accordingly sent him a polite invitation to meet him in debate whenever the people may call for it. A very large attendance is expected at the Kasson debate.

Communications.

He Dodged the Question.

A few evenings since John H. Watterson, a Catholic bishop with headquarters at Columbus, O., delivered a lecture at the Grand Opera House in this city, the subject of which was "Miracles." A fair crowd listened to his harang, consisting in the main of those who make the sign of the cross and count beads. A few Protestants were also there, and the Freethinking classes were not conspicuous by their absence. The latter were on hand in quest of information. They had paid their money perchance to gain a crumb of positiv knowledge concerning another world, but they received it not. The same old hoots that hav been hooted since the time of the first popish owl were hooted over again. The Protestants were given the cold shoulder—in other words, were told they had separated from the true church, and were to day following "false prophets and false Christs." Poor Protestant! He dare not deny, and during Watterson's talk at least he was compelled to swallow bitter Catholic pills. And thus it has been for years and years. The Catholic has accused the Protestant of blasphemy, and the Protestant has never tired in hurling the same accusation in the face of the Catholic. It has been and is now the story of "I hav come not to bring peace but the sword." In this respect the passage, "Eat, drink, and be merry, for to morrow we die," is lost sight of.

Watterson received no verbal introduction preceding his lecture. That came through the columns of a daily paper. It gave out that he was to answer Col. Robert G. Ingersoll's Part II. on "Miracles," which appeared in the March number of the North American Review. This preface announcement was a complete lie from beginning to end. It styled Ingersoll as an Infidel, which is false. An Infidel is one who professes something that he does not believe. Colonel Ingersoll is not such a creature. Persons of that stamp generally thrive best when connected with some church. You can find them occupying pulpits, swinging censers, and collecting money for the heathen. The pulpit, the censer, and the heathen are the worse off for it.

It was also stated that Ingersoll believed in the non-existence of a God, which is a lie cut and dried. Being an Agnostic, and not an Infidel, he neither affirms or denies a God, but does deny a hell of fire filled with brains and innocence, and a cruel Jehovah, and a heaven containing thieves, murderers, and impostors, crowned and winged. He denies all the monsters of the skies, and claims for man the right to make an honest God. To use his language, "An honest God is the noblest work of man."

Watterson commenced his lecture with the "building of the tower of Babel." He continued along the moss-grown Catholic path, reciting the so called miracles of old, and the supernatural work accomplished since then through the instrumentality and for the use of the Catholic church, solely and alone. Said he: "And the Lord came down and confounded their language. The people were scattered thereby over the face of the earth. Different languages thus originated, followed by different beliefs. Infidels and such like were divided by the rule of very vulgar fractions."

Learned and immense argument for a bishop! He believes the Lord came down. Where from? From "heaven" or from "purgatory?" Is it possible for an omnipresent being to descend from a point above to a specified place below? In answering these questions Watterson should bear in mind that at the outset he admitted that the Lord did come down to see "the city and the tower." This further admits that the Lord's eyesight was defectiv—that he could not see from where he lived or from where he was. And still further, it destroys God's most potent attributes, those on which the church so much depends. It makes it impossible for the Catholic God to be everywhere—"in every atom, and in every star." His "power to perform the miraculous" disappears. It is consigned to the tomb—buried beneath a million facts, the last of which is Watterson's opening remark. Poor fellow! With his own weapon he rendered powerless the main support of church and priest. He comes in under the old couplet:

> And Satan still some mischief finds
> For idle hands to do.

As to the "confounding of their language," I do not see how it could be, only by the destruction of memory. Did Watterson's God do this? Will he explain how?

According to Watterson's remarks, taken from the holy evidence, this confounding of language made the builders of the tower scatter over the face of the earth; thus resulted different languages and different beliefs, and Infidels and such like were divided by the rule of very vulgar fractions. Is it possible that people when they lose anything of value immediately separate and scatter here, there, and everywhere? Is this an established rule of action? Were a party of persons to lose a wallet of money on the streets of a city, would they at once go to other cities to look for it? Says Ingersoll: "Why would the confounding of language make them separate? Why would they not stay together until they could understand each other? People will not separate from weakness. When in trouble they come together and desire the assistance of each other. Why, in this instance, did they separate? What particular ones would naturally come together if nobody understood the language of any other person? Would it not hav been just as hard to agree when and where to go, without any language to express the agreement, as to go on with the building of the tower?"

A person who reasons and investigates for himself knows that man gets his ideas from nature, Bishop Watterson and the Bible to the contrary notwithstanding.

These ideas are expressed by certain sounds suggested by his experiences, arising from having loved, enjoyed, hated, suffered, and hoped.

"Do we not know that words are continually dying, and continually being born; that every language has its cradle and its cemetery—its buds, its blossoms, its fruits and its withered leaves?"

As to the birth of beliefs, I hold a different opinion to that laid down by Watterson.

Of Catholicism, Methodism, Presbyterianism, and such like—of their true origin, their cruelties, and their crimes—I will not hav time to speak. It sufficeth to say that each and every one when in the minority has been liberal indeed, but in the ascendency arrogant and unmerciful. As to Freethinkers in general, Watterson thinks they came from the "very vulgar." I will ask him if he thinks George Washington came from such a source? That Jefferson so descended? That Abraham Lincoln lived and died a relativ of the vulgar? Another thing, does he consider Noah, Lot, Abraham, and David samples of the opposit? Does the Bible contain nothing vulgar? Is the song of Solomon overflowing with the virtuous? Is not the story of Jesus Christ's birth blasphemously obscene?

Dropping the tower of Babel, the confounding of the language, the scatterment of the people, etc., he said: "Perhaps a great many of you hav read Mr. Robert G. Ingersoll's latest production concerning miracles. It appeared in the March number of the North American Review. Now, to-night I am going to do what he has not done. I am going to tell you what a miracle is. There is nothing like a clear definition, and evidently Mr. Ingersoll does not comprehend such a definition. A miracle is a sensible event outside the order of created nature." Thus he set out, declaring the positiv existence of the super natural, and then jumping about like a bullfrog from bank to bank, not knowing where he jumped. He accused Mr. Ingersoll, all Freethinkers and Protestants, with "begging the question." The truth is, Bishop Watterson "dodged the question," and were I to play hide and-seek with him for one night for money he would break me before the dawn of day. He failed to answer Colonel Ingersoll's Review article. In fact he never referred to a line of it, and spent the time in quoting David Hume and several others to prove that Voltaire and Ingersoll were wrong. What Hume wrote cannot be held as containing the thoughts presented in Ingersoll's Review article. To hav answered that Watterson should hav confined himself to the claims and questions which it contains. The proper way and the fair way for him to do would be to answer it like a man through the columns of the Review over his signature. This I defy him to do. I defy him to make his argument thus, and rest the case with the people of the world. I even defy him to meet the questions in this very humble epistle. Will he do it?

As he failed to quote Ingersoll in his Portsmouth lecture I will now do it for him. The proposition laid down by his definition of a miracle is in substance this: "Nature exists. The creature of an infinit intelligence, man, looks about him and realizes that all he sees did not come by chance. Through the senses God reveals himself to finite mortals." Does he mean to say that the God that came down to see the city and the tower, the God he robbed of potent attributes, made mankind and created nature? Does he mean to leave this inference, or has he a supply of Gods on hand? Colonel Ingersoll once said: "It is illogical to say, because of the existence of this earth and of what you can see in and about it, that there must be an infinit intelligence. You do not know that even the creation of this world and of all planets discovered required an infinit power or infinit wisdom. I admit that it is impossible for me to look at a watch and draw the inference that there was no design in its construction, or that it only happened. I could not regard it as some freak of nature, neither could I imagin that its various parts were brought together and set in motion by chance. I am not a believer in chance. But there is a vast difference between what man has made and the materials of which he has constructed the things he has made. You find a watch and you say it exhibits or shows design. You insist that it is so wonderful that it must hav had a designer—in other words, that it is too wonderful not to hav been constructed. You then find the watchmaker, and you say with regard to him that he, too, must hav had a designer, for he is more wonderful than the watch. In imagination you go from the watchmaker to the being you call God, and you say he designed the watchmaker, but he himself was not designed because he is too wonderful to hav been designed. And yet in the case of the watch and of the watchmaker, it was the wonder that suggested design, while in the case of the maker of the watchmaker, the wonder denied a designer. Do you not see that the argument devours itself? If wonder suggests a designer, can it go on increasing until it denies that which it suggested? You must remember, too, that the argument of design is applicable to all. You are not at liberty to stop at sunrise and sunset and growing corn and all that adds to the happiness of man; you must go further. You must admit that an infinitly wise and merciful God designed the fangs of serpents, the machinery by which the poison is distilled, the ducts by which it is carried to the fangs, and that the same intelligence impressed this serpent with a desire to deposit this deadly virus in the flesh of man. You must believe that an infinitly wise God so constructed this world that in the process of cooling earthquakes would be caused—earthquakes that devour and overwhelm cities and states. Do you see any design in the volcano that sends its rivers of lava over the fields and homes of men? Do you really think that a perfectly good being designed the invisible parasites that infest the air, that inhabit the water, and that finally attack and destroy the health and life of man? Do you see the same design in cancers that you do in wheat and corn? Did God invent tumors for the brain? Was it his ingenuity that so designed the human race that millions of people should be born deaf and dumb, that millions should be idiotic? Did he knowingly plant in the blood or brain the seeds of insanity? Did he cultivate those seeds? Do you see any design in this?"

Let Mr. Watterson giv his attention to these questions. Let him answer if he can. He accuses Colonel Ingersoll of "begging the question." The fact is he has been for years begging for answers to what he has asked. As yet no sound response has come. Such as Watterson hav been dodging all the while. They dare not speak out, honor bright. Why? Because they are intellectual slaves. They are held in bondage by creeds, the lines of which are black as night. Two hundred years ago they would hav answered by brute force—with lash and sword and flame. The advancement they hav made and are making to-day is not due to the miraculous but to Liberal thought and work, naturally produced and naturally given. They ought to be thankful. But they are not. They are full of hate, and wish again for the barbarity of the past.

Watterson lays great stress on the "miracles" that the Catholic saints hav wrought since the days of Jesus. It is impossible, according to his version, to palm off a sleight-of-hand trick on the pope. He admits that a miracle to be at all must be superior to nature; in other words, if produced within nature it would not be a miracle, but a natural fact. It must be supernatural and produced by supernatural power. And yet he has the audacity to appeal to the natural to prove the supernatural; to establish for you and me a miracle by natural persons through natural means. He should not cut loose from the supernatural wagon, but remain in the harness and prove the miraculous by the miraculous.

On the night in question he referred to a so-called miracle said to hav occurred in France. The substance of the story was this: A child not two years old was apparently dead. The mother, frantic with grief, grabbed the little one in her arms and rushed out into the open air. It was in the month of February and the water of a stream near at hand was icy cold. Miraculous cures had been effected here by making the sign of the cross and appealing to the Virgin (?) Mary. To this stream the mother made her way. She passed through the streets of the city like a raving maniac, and arriving at the water's edge, notwithstanding the entreaties of bystanders to desist, plunged her darling into the cold, crystal stream up to its neck, at the same time going through the manual of popish incantations. From thence she returned to her home and put the baby to bed. It slept for twelve hours, awoke, and at once wanted nourishment. This was given and signs of returning strength were manifest. Presently, although before it was paralyzed, it made an effort to get out of its cradle, and the next day, when the mother was in another room, it did leap forth and walk. This particular miracle was investigated by the Catholic church and passed the gauntlet. It was marked genuin, and thus labeled is palmed off on the ignorant and credulous thousands who grovel in the dust and pay for purgatorial prayers. My heart goes out to them, one and all. May the day soon come when they shall be banished from Eden, "that their eyes may be opened, and they become as gods knowing good from evil."

In looking over the above miracle report it will be noticed that the babe was only plunged into the water up to its neck. Does not that show that the mother was under the influence of the natural? Was she not obeying the natural instinct within? Otherwise what would hav been the result? Will Bishop Watterson claim that the child could hav lived under water? Is he a believer in the established rule "that fire burns and water drowns?"

Last November myself and family took our departure for the South. It was on the 16th of the month. The train that carried us from home was very late, and we got to Cincinnati close on to midnight. The mercury had fallen to a low point. It was bitter cold. The first touch of winter had invaded the north. Our first-born was just over a terrible attack of typhoid fever one month, and the exposure of that night produced a return of fever. He was burning hot. We called in a physician, Dr. Armstrong by name. What did he do? Said he, "Put the little fellow in a bath, hydrant cold. Keep him in ten minutes." We did it. We made no signs nor offered up any prayers. We followed the advice of the man of medicin. Lifting our child from the cold water, we wrapped him in a blanket, and soon he was in sweet repose. He slept soundly and every minute of his "forty winks" gave him strength and vitality in proportion. When he awoke he showed a good appetite, and nourishment administered increased his strength. He was not a year old then. Had he been two years of age I hav no doubt he would hav "leaped from his cradle and walked." And another thing—during the time of his long siege with the terrible typhoid his mother and I flatly refused to hav him baptized. The Christians about us made daily calls, pleading that the little one be sprinkled. He would be lost, they said, if he was not, and if anything would cure him, baptism would. No doubt these people were sincere, but we were also sincere in our way. We had investigated and they had not. We did not depend on signs and wonders—they did. So we said, "It is good medicin and good nursing that will count. We trust more to that than to prayer and water." We followed our creed and our boy is living to-day. Now, I hav related a case similar in all respects to Watterson's illustration, with the exception of the side issue of paralyzation. Does he believe that God specially enacted this cure? Will he giv Dr. Armstrong no credit at all? Would he believe it a miracle if I would claim it such? In fact, does he think the miraculous occurs among Protestants and Freethinkers? Does he believe in the miracle of the Hindoos? Will he giv credence to Mohammed's ascension?

Bishop Watterson is a finite being, yet he talks as though he had an infinit comprehension. He spreads himself upon the rock of St. Peter, and proclaims that God amounts to naught if all things are not possible with him. And then he claims that all things are. Being finite, will he inform me how he comprehends the infinit? Does he honestly think that nothing is impossible with his God? Does he really know this? If so, will he explain how God would go about to make two trains pass on one and the same track without injury and without loss of life? Does he think he could make the thread that courses the spool hav only one end? That the head of a tiny insect could be severed from its body and the parts sewed together with a log chain? I am not willing to believe all these things. It remains for Finite Watterson to make plain the assertions he makes and answer the questions that daily arise antagonistic to the miraculous. Let us hear his say.

Religion—What Is It?

Religion is the fanaticism of error.

There is no "real religion." What is called such is science, honesty, morality, love, justice, truth, etc.

"Right-doing" is not religion. Right-doing is duty, justice, and wisdom. Religion is faith in error and a worship of myths.

The office of religion, especially the Christian religion, is to despise, persecute, and put to death all dissenters. One of its commands is, "Those my enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Jesus).

Why not call the cardinal virtues by their right names, and not label them with the accursed word "religion," and thus disgrace them? Why not call honesty honesty, and not religion? Why call justice religion; why not call it justice? Is not the word justice good enough to define it with and distinguish it by? Why should love, forgivness, and charity be claimed as religious virtues, when tens of thousands of people practice them daily who utterly repudiate all religions! Benevolence, too, is said to be one of the Christian virtues, as if no one was benevolent outside of Christianity! Why not let these virtues stand upon their own merits instead of submerging them beneath the Christian blood of religion! Why eclipse these excellent qualities under the fogs and myths of heathen Christianity by calling them religion—"real religion?" Throw away the cruel word "religion," and change "real" to realism, and call these virtues realism, if you please, but never, no, never disgrace these cardinal virtues with the ulcerous word "religion!"

All religions hav to steal the cardinal virtues in order to be respectable, and of any value. Do not then pay these religions the poor compliment of apparently accepting from them what has always been ours, the property of the dissenters, and which they hav so feloniously wrested from us, and so mixed with their mummeries as to make even truth itself ashamed to be found in their counterfeit company, baptized with the fictitious cognomen "real religion!" I hav said enough.

Transubstantiation.

A lady in a certain small village donated to her church the bread and wine for sacramental purposes. An old, gray-haired negro man was chosen to perform the duty of conveying the sacrament to the village church. The old negro, being called to perform his solemn duty, raised his hat, and with awe approached the tray bearing the sacrament. With a solemn and faltering voice he said, "Missus, I is been gwine to ax you dis long time what dis am."

Mistress: "What is the sacrament?"

Negro: "Who am de sacramen'?"

Mistress: "The sacrament is taken in representation of the body and blood of the blessed lamb; only those that are quickened and born to a life of immortality partake thereof."

Negro: "I doan' 'zactly see."

Mistress: "Not being born again, it is impossible for you to understand the glorious feeling that inspires the true Christian soul after partaking of the blood and body of the blessed lamb."

"Deas am 'culiar doin's," remarked the old negro man, as he deposited his tray on the small table in the village church, and retired to the corner to remain until the solemn occasion ended. Returning home the old negro man said to his wife: "See here, Hanna, I is gwine to tell yo dis an' yo must not blab to de odder niggas. To-day me axed de missus what dis was on dat tray, and she say it was de body an' de blood of a lam. and dat a purson hab to be born agin fo da could eat dat body and drink de blood of dat lam. But yo noes dis nigga waen born again, and me tells you dis, dat de blood of dat lam am good. After dis nigga got a whiff of dat blood he nearly emptied dat pitcha and put wata in de pitcha agin. And doan yo know dis nigga was a settin' in dat back corner a tremlen' for fea de misus would find it out. But dem people what was born agin coulden' tell the difference 'tween good and bad blood. Dem long-headed parsons might palm dat bread for body off on dem women, but me tells yo dis—he coulden' make dis nigga bleeve dat bread am mutton."

Truth Stranger Than Fiction.

From the Leavenworth, Kan., Sun.

For many months the papers hav been filled with news and discussions concerning the great doctrinal upheaval in the Presbyterian church. The question of overhauling a creed and eliminating important dogmas, that for hundreds of years hav been believed to be true, must certainly be one of great moment to its adherents. The membership of that church has argued and disputed over the proposed change with more or less warmth. The churches and presbyteries hav prayed, reasoned, wrangled, and voted, and the result is that the liberal or progressiv element has carried the day. The national council is now arranging the plans and specifications for making the change.

It is a serious thing for a person to giv up a cherished belief. It involves a snapping of heart-strings like standing beside the couch of a dying mother. But such is the order of nature. Dogmas liv and die. Beliefs are transitory. What was true in the light of yesterday is found to be false in the light of to-day. When the conservativ old Presbyterian church cuts loose from its moss-grown moorings it is time for us all to be moving on.

It may be said that this marks an era in theological evolution in this country, for its influence will extend through all the various denominations, begetting a like spirit of dissatisfaction with the old shackles of human thought, inciting inquiry, doubt, discussion, and demands for greater liberty, and resulting in a general shaking-up and the setting of new landmarks.

The question now comes, to whom or to what cause are we indebted for this great theological revolution? Who among all the lowly sons of men was honored by omnipotence and chosen by him to giv utterance to the words that set in motion this gigantic wave of human thought? Was it the high and gifted Talmage? Or the great and honored Gladstone? No, it was neither one. To answer this question will surprise and startle you. You will not, you cannot believe it.

For it was none other than a poor "heathen" away over in China that a Presbyterian missionary was seeking to convert. A poor "pagan" follower of Confucius "the Wise," who, in his wonderful code of morals, written five hundred years before Christ, renders the Golden Rule in eight different forms.

The circumstances of the case are simply these: About three years ago a missionary connected with the Canton mission went to a neighboring town to establish a branch. He soon made the acquaintance of Lee Chi Sing, an intelligent nativ, who gladly accepted the opportunity to investigate the Christian religion. He was so sincere and frank in his manner that the missionary had strong hopes of his conversion. But finally he asked the missionary one day concerning the fate of infants and that of his ancestors who had died without Christ. After repeated attempts, as usual, to evade the question, the missionary was finally cornered, and compelled to admit that his religion taught that they were in hell. The indignation of the Chinaman burst forth in expressions of horror. He told the missionary that he did not want his religion—it could not be true. It was too unreasonable, too unjust, too cruel, too vindictiv, too devilish for him to believe. He would not liv in its heaven unless his ancestors, his relativs, his wife and babies, could be there, too. If they were sent to hell he desired to go with them to comfort them and share their fate. Nothing should separate him from those he loved. Heaven would be a hell to him, knowing they were in torment.

This being the culmination to a long series of similar failures and disappointments, it made a deep impression upon the missionary's mind. To liv at ease and hold down a profitable job did not satisfy him. He was too conscientious. He resolved to throw up and return to America. He did so, and tendered his resignation to the Board of Missions. He told them plainly of his failure and discouragement; explained to them the nature of the obstacles in the way of success, and pointed his argument by giving a vivid narration of his conversation with Lee Chi Sing.

The board realized at once that the long-dreaded crisis had come. Something must be done. Either the creed must be changed or missionary labor in China abandoned. This conclusion was communicated to others and the leaven spread. The seed of rational truth so unconsciously sown by the humble "pagan" in Christian soil took root and grew, and brought forth an abundant yield. The harvest of reason is being gathered in, and the promis for the future is bright.

It is a law of nature and an axiom of natural philosophy that no two bodies in motion can come into contact without the direction of each being changed. This is true of persons, of religions, and of nations. China being very much the older and greater of the two, in coming in contact with her greater momentum, we shall receive as a matter of fact the greater deflection from our course. The chances are in the same disproportion against us, that, in the place of Christianizing China, we shall be paganized by her instead.

But there is no reason for alarm. What is, is right. The laws of nature are good. Nothing takes place but in accordance with law. This is only a result under the infinit law of commercial exchange. We are shipping our surplus product of idealism to China and exchanging it for the overstock of realism that she has on hand. We hav too much theology and not enough reason, too much faith and not enough practice; while China has too much materialism and not enough poetry, too much fact and not enough fancy, too much reason and not enough emotion. A fair exchange is no robbery, and will, we trust, be a benefit to both. China is old, great, and wise. She is, so to speak, our great-great-grandmother, and we really ought to be a pupil at her feet instead of presuming to be her teacher.

Confusion as to Divine Guidance.

From the San Francisco Argonaut.

In the early days of Maine Methodism it was the custom for young ministers to consult their presiding elders before taking a wife. Once, during a camp-meeting in eastern Maine, a young minister approached the presiding elder and said he wished to be married.

"Whom do you propose to marry?" asked the elder.

"Well," said the young man, "the Lord has made known to me very clearly that I should marry Sister Mary Turner."

"I know her well," said the elder; "she is a fine girl. I will see you again before the meeting closes."

During the week four other young ministers consulted the presiding elder on the subject of marriage. Each of them gave the name of the young woman to whom he proposed to offer himself. They had all prayed over the matter a great deal, and each was certain that it was the Lord's desire that he should marry the person named. Neither of the five young men knew that anyone else had consulted the elder on that subject. On the last day of the camp-meeting, at noon, the elder called the five young ministers to his tent to receive his opinion. He said:

"Now, brethren, it may be the will of God for you to marry, but it is not his will that five Methodist ministers should marry little Mary Turner."

THIS side to-day, to-morrow t'other burns,
And they're all God almighty in their turns.

The Holy Land.

A sensible American traveler named Henry Mac donald communicates to a home journal some descriptions of Jerusalem and its environs which, as giving the truth on subjects long obscured and falsified by Christian reporters, is worthy of notice. This city, with the surrounding country, has been so idealized by pious poets and enthusiasts who never saw it, and its physical characteristics hav been so used to typify spiritual ones, that any attempt at truthful description has always been a thankless task. But despite the praises Christians lavish, this writer avers that the unbiased observer can scarcely see in the rocky, bleak, unpicturesque hill, surrounded with monotonous, gloomy ravines, and hopelessly arid, desolate ridges of rock, that Mount Zion "beautiful in situation, the joy of the earth." Jerusalem's streets this correspondent describes as dirty, winding, ill-paved, steep lanes, reeking with indescribable filth, and impossible to traverse with any kind of a vehicle. Not a well or a drop of living water is, or ever was, within its infected walls, nor nearer in any direction than two and a half miles, and that a small, ill-smelling pool. Within the walls of this city, which only the most malignant sarcasm could dub "holy," is more repulsiv wretchedness, heart-broken degradation, hideous, leprosy-deformed, sore-eyed, sordid imposture, blind fanaticism, and putrid filth than on any other spot of similar dimensions on this trouble-laden planet. Here is the place to anatomize all the baser qualities of mankind. Originally a robber stronghold, even in David's time it was little better than a hill fort, the wild hold of a successful sheik; it could not hav been much better in Solomon's time, and after his death, on the disruption of the little kingdom, it lost its importance until Herod's time, when it achieved its greatest magnificence, which itself did not exceed in character or extent that of the present day. Since the days of Jesus it has been pinched by famins, desolated by wars, bloodied by massacres, and its buildings destroyed time and again, but notwithstanding all that the credulous pilgrim is shown the exact places where events occurred that were of trifling importance at the time, more than eighteen centuries ago. A man could throw a stone the entire distance of the Via Dolorosa, yet in this small space the pilgrim is shown Pilate's house and judgment seat; where Jesus leaned his shoulder against a house and left the impression in the solid rock; where he met his mother, the house of St. Veronica, upon whose handkerchief he left the imprint of his face; the house of Dives and the stone upon which Lazarus sat; where Simeon was compelled to take the cross, and the sepulcher. A child would ask how this narrow lane, with its sharp turns and numerous windings, happens to correspond so exactly with the ancient one, or how arches, walls, houses, and stones could remain intact and be identified after the total destruction of the city by the Romans.

It will occur to most as strange that a God so prolific as ours is accounted to be in visible testimonies, should hav left in such littleness and squalor as our traveler reports the city that he once blessed with his presence in flesh. Could Jerusalem now be pointed out to us as the chief city of the world, and its inclosing province as a seat of arts and sciences, prosperity and glory, the Christian contender could indeed claim a certain measure of attestation. But precisely antithetical is the state of the land as set forth in the preceding paragraph.

The instance of fraudulency in the relic business given above is but one among multitudes. The Church of the Holy Sepulcher is where credulity is stuffed to more than repletion. Within this church is shown some of the earth from which Adam was made, also his grave; a pillar marking the exact center of the earth as pointed out by Jesus; the silver cup used at the last supper; the spot where Abraham offered up the ram in place of Isaac, and the bush in which the ram was caught; the stone on which John the Baptist was beheaded; the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus; Jesus's prison and the spot where the Virgin stood; the place where the two thieves were crucified and the hole in which the true cross stood. The pillar to which Jesus was bound is inclosed in a screen with a hole in it, through which the pious thrust a stick, the application of which will cure disease. A small marble slab, with an aperture two inches wide, is shown as the rock that was rent in twain. The sepulcher is inclosed in a little marble chapel about seven feet square, on one side of which is the stone couch upon which Jesus is said to hav been laid. Here the following incident attended our relater's investigations:

"On the end of the couch is a money plate, which I noticed was well supplied with coin and bills. I turned to look at the tawdry, tinsel ornament of the place, and the attendant priest, thinking I was going out without giving the customary fee, tapped me on the shoulder and pointed suggestivly to the plate. This is the secret of all the shrines and holy places. If you attempt to pass any you are followed, the fame of the place is extoled, and you are importuned to look at it."

Through a hole in the wall of the sepulcher where Mr. Macdonald met this exemplification of priestly methods, is shown at Easter the miraculous holy fire that descends from heaven and lights the lamps within.

The fostering of folly and superstition in this church is not the only result of this deliberate imposture of the clergy; it arouses the worst passions of ignorant pilgrims. No year passes without some accident, some old woman crushed or weakly person trampled to death by the frantic, fanatic hordes. Rival sects stab each other in the confusion. Not many years ago more than four hundred persons were killed in the melee in this church, some of whom were piled up on the stone of unction itself. Turkish guards are stationed in the church to keep the rival sects from cutting each other's throats. It is the opinion of this communicator that nowhere does the Turk appear to better advantage than at Jerusalem. Nowhere does his stern monotheism appear to better advantage than when contrasted with the gainful, superstitious idolatry and the mutual animosity and rivalry of the different churches. He governs and farms out the sacred ground, and philosophically prefers taxing superstition to persecuting it. Each church bids against the other for privileges, and their bribes are pocketed and repaid with unmeasured and deserved contempt.

Our describer says that "no critical person can believe that the crucifixion took place on the spot indicated;" and from the grounds he givs, this affirmation may indeed be safely made. The New Testament writers declare Jesus to hav been crucified "without the gate," nigh to the city, at a place called Golgotha, and apparently near some public thoroughfare; they also say the sepulcher in which his body was laid was hewn out of a rock in a garden at the place of crucifixion. But by this writer's account this place is far within the city walls, and many requirements must always hav been absent from the locality now assigned. The early Christian writers do not make the slightest allusion to the scene of those events; no importance was attached to them. The places were not heard of during three hundred years, when, Christianity becoming a state religion, Constantine's mother, an ignorant, credulous old lady of eighty years, was persuaded by the clergy to look over the sites of actions of such importance. The success of the undertaking was assured from the start. After digging a great depth three crosses were miraculously found. A noble lady lay sick unto death; two of the discovered crosses were shown her, but they only made her worse. At the sight of the third she sprang from her bed perfectly cured. Thus the site of the crucifixion was discovered! Such evidence is good only for such centuries as invented it.

The entire country is filled with fictitious places of importance to Christianity which are a source of revenue to the custodians. Holy sites were asked for, sought for and invented. The faint outline of a legend becomes a full and glowing picture, and as time advances is gradually embellished with graphic details. Divine intonations, miraculous tests, and even the evidence of the devil himself are all adduced in proof. Conjecture becomes certainty.

From the top of Mt. Olivet Mr. Macdonald obtained a view which enabled him to form an easy conception of the extent of the former empire of God's people. King Solomon's empire was scarcely the size of New Jersey, not one fifth the size of Ohio, and as its physical character must hav always been the same as to-day, we must account for the stories of its magnificence by that infirmity of the oriental, exaggeration. Land becomes better by lying idle, rocks disintegrate and form soil; if there was soil in ancient days it must hav miraculously disappeared, as there are no traces of it, even where it might hav been washed to. A people from the deserts of Sinai might imagin any country where a tree grew or where it even rained as a "land flowing with milk and honey." A small, steril, pastoral country is never wealthy; the people of Palestine had neither arts nor manufactures, and must hav been peculiarly poverty-stricken. From all the numerous excavations nothing older than the Roman period has been obtained. The stories of Solomon's magnificence, outrivaling that of Xerxes, his harem of one thousand wives and his temple, must be ascribed to the patriotic exaggeration of a late writer.

The account of the different sacred places around Jerusalem can be, this writer says, as said D. M. Bennett and every plaindealing man that has been there, but a monotonous recital of fraud and imposture. At the Church of the Ascension is shown where the foot of Jesus made an impression on solid rock as he ascended to heaven; at the chapel of the Assumption of the Virgin is the rock bearing the marks of her girdle she let fall to convince St. Thomas; another shows the imprint of the foot of the rooster that crew at Peter's denial; in the garden of Gethsemane, a place about fifty yards square, the priest shows the impression in the rock of the bodies of the disciples who fell asleep while Jesus prayed; the garden belongs to the Roman church, but the Greek church, enraged at the monopoly, hav started an opposition one. They do not care to exhibit it much yet, as they wish to wait a few years until the trees look older. The writer's words upon some further ones of the marvels exhibited compel a smile from the reader:

"A deep grotto at Bethlehem is shown as the birthplace of Jesus, and within a few feet of the stone manger, in which lies a dressed-up doll to represent Jesus, is a small hole where two thousand of the children massacred by Herod were thrown. Whether Jesus was born at Bethlehem or Nazareth is a matter of conjecture, but this grotto was certainly never a stable, unless the animals were miraculously endowed with wings."

Our readers are probably aware of Russia's desire to extend her sway over this and adjacent lands in the East, and they know how useful an instrument religious proselytism has always proved in such schemes of enlargement of the domains of despots. Accordingly we meet both in cable news and this letter the statement that the great mass of pilgrims are Russians. The pilgrimage to the holy places is a political movement, a crusade. Russian money is freely spent in the erection of churches and convents. Russian vessels are subsidized to carry pilgrims cheaply, and Greek church convents feed them five days free of charge.

Of the character of these blind tools of the czar and the Greek church, the pilgrims, we obtain no flattering account. Both men and women wear great boots; their bodies clothed with padded, quilted garments, giv them a stunted appearance. Their rolling, waddling, ungainly gait, like that of so many bears; their Tartar eyes and noses, and hard, leathery faces from which no ray of intelligence ever beams—all make up an appearance that is scarcely human. Nothing can be more pitiful or present a more abject appearance than these devotees as they crawl from one site of superstition to another. No fakirs or dancing dervishes yield themselvs up to more unreasoning fanaticism than this horde of semi-human savages, who are noted for their devoutness and orthodoxy.

It has been customary for Freethinkers to remark upon the characteristic inconsistency Christians display in ill using a certain race because that race were foreordained from eternity to be the choiceless—and, as we see in the event, the beneficent—instruments in an action for the saving of the world. We daily hear of some persecution of the Jewish people in European countries; and that their fare in the vicinity of their ancient abode is the same this correspondent informs us:

"There is one point of unanimity among all the sects and races—hatred of the Jews, the race which has furnished the prophets and apostles; an unreasoning hatred when we reflect, as Disraeli expressed it, that one-half of Christendom worship a Jew and the other half a Jewess. Even to-day a Jew is not allowed to pass in front of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher."

Such, then, is the condition of that spot of earth which if any should certainly hav been elected to favor and prosperity by the Lord. Wretched it was, wretched it has continued, and as wretched it remains as has the doctrin to which it gave birth made mankind wherever it has penetrated. Such, be it noted, is the territory whose smiling loveliness and holy beauty supplies our pious literature with an inexhaustible theme. Such are the holes and hummocks and barbarian dens whose minutest particulars American children spend priceless hours of youth in memorizing, to the exclusion of that real instruction for lack of which nations falter and humanity groans. Such, too, are the purposes of delusion and defraudation for which the shrines are administered and the relics exhibited; such are the political and despotical ends which they are maintained to subserve, and such are the foul lies by which the whole detestable system is perpetuated.

A Pulpit Ass.

In his sermon of the 20th ult. the Rev. Frank Brobst, of the Westminster Presbyterian church, Chicago, Ill., uttered these sentiments on the Lake Pepin disaster:

"Last Sabbath was a day full of horror. A disaster of a terrible nature swept down upon scores of individuals who, instead of following the law of God for the observance of the Sabbath, were engaged in doing their own pleasure—exercising their own personal whims and caprices. With no regard for God's wish or law, they embarked on a boat for a pleasure excursion across the lake. The tornado came howling and shrieking along, seized upon their craft, and overwhelmed it in the deep water. The surroundings, so entirely godless, were seemingly so secure, so safe. Then the storm came, and showed their utter helplessness before this frightful judgment. Sabbath desecration always brings disaster. It is God's law."

It is no easy matter to choose from the execrable characteristics of this utterance, the one that deserves first mention and preëminence in our holding forth of the whole to the scorn of the world. Nor would two of these pages suffice for the deserved reprobation of all the imbecility, falsity, heartlessness, bigotry, selfishness, and meanness that is stuffed into these dozen lines.

The implication that there is a law of God for the observance of Sunday, the first day of the week, as the Sabbath that God is said to hav commanded the Jews to celebrate on the seventh day, is a falsehood. The denunciation of the excursionists for "doing their own pleasure" is a cry of clerical indignation at the passing of the old regime under which the preacher compelled the people to do his pleasure instead of their own. The use of the expression, "exercising their own personal whims and caprices," to indicate the seeking of a mite of relief and change, of natural pleasure and healthful exercise, in the rare interval of wearying and cramping toil, writes the speaker down a soulless villain of whom there can be less hope than of many a felon that fills a cell. The condemnation of the poor victims of the lake for having "no regard for God's wish or law," we shall correctly receive as abuse of those who hav no regard for the clergy's wish or law—those who do not better fill the Rev. Frank Brobst's pews and pockets. As the clergyman dwells upon the fact that "the surroundings, so entirely godless, were seemingly so secure, so safe," and then introduces the breaking of the storm, he seems to gloat over the dashing of the hopes and the destruction of the lives of the unfortunates. In the statement, "Sabbath desecration always brings disaster; it is God's law," the speaker, who should know as well as everyone else that statistics reveal no more disasters on Sunday than on any other day, shows himself either a conscious liar or a fool.

Why are such malicious witlings, such envious simpletons, such peevish asses, such covetous dolts, such vaporing knaves, such selfish blockheads, such querulous babblers, as this Rev. Frank Brobst, listened to for one moment by a gathering of professedly sensible and decent Americans?

A Freethought Museum.

The London Freethinker is the recipient of letters proposing the founding of a Freethought Museum. One writer says:

"It would act as a great moral lesson, as it should include models of the instruments of torture formerly used as arguments against heretics. The thumb-screw, the iron boot, the rack, the collar of torture, the scavenger's daughter, etc., etc., all should be represented. A literary department could also be made very interesting, as there are many who would doubtless contribute some rarities. I should be pleased to contribute a letter written by the grand old martyr, Richard Carlisle, to my father more than fifty years ago. I disentombed it lately from an old desk, where it had been quietly locked up for many years."

We commend the project, and entertain the expectation that some future decade may discover among American Freethinkers enthusiasm and means adequate to the erection of a like institution here. Figural representation of such objects of consideration as admit of it, is not a little more impressiv than verbal. Though unable to reach to the mode of presentation projected in the museum, we ourselvs hav at least made an advance upon merely letterpress description, in the gallery of vivid illustrations of Christian figures and doings that we are composing by our weekly cartoons. And the little collection of engravings of pious instruments of torture that embellishes our last ANNUAL perhaps is, as calculated to bring to the mind the horrible reality of the subject with something more of fulness than mere words would do, not altogether to be despised.

The sooner such museums are established the more complete can the collections be made. There are now passing away in our midst many types of fearfully and wonderfully made Christianity that if not now secured and preserved will be irretrievably lost to our progeny. The Calvinist, supposed by nearly all to be fossilized safe against time and change in that rock called faith, is undeniably beginning to exhibit stir and transformation. It is too much to hope that action will be taken in time to secure a fit Mormon contingent to this truly moral show; jars and alcohol will, we fear, be brought forward too late, and posterity will hav to content itself with merely a wax group of the Latter Day Saint, embosomed in accessory connubial figures, with a finger upon his pentateuchal passages of empowerment. The Roman Catholic monkish orders constitute a more enduring genus, and many species of this breed, of curious cranial deformity and interesting grotesqueness of garb, may diversify the exhibition galleries. Of the laymen of this last-mentioned church, suitable types may be preserved with no great addition of spirit to that already in them; and the singular constitution of those among the God-in-the-Constitutionists who are now attracting the most attention—their rare blockish or wooden, if we may so express it, fiber—their present condition, if assertions be true, of half-petrifaction, would ask but trifling expenditure of alcohol. Not delaying to enumerate the many other obtainable specimens equally edificatory to the naturalist of the future and diverting to the youth, we need only advert, as sufficiently evinciv of the prodigious success that must gratify such an enterprise, to the effect of the very Talmage, pickled in the Chamber of Horrors.

Faith Cure.

Cases in which children, or others in a dependent relation, hav been allowed by persons believing in Faith Cure to suffer illness without medical aid, are numerously reported. Two this week are as follows.

In Omaha, Neb., a woman has died through reliance on a female professional Faith Curer. The healer has been held for trial. The local paper remarks, "If she can be well punished, her fate may discourage other medical frauds who liv on public credulity." We were unaware that we had in Omaha a fellow-journal of our own Antichristian principle; yet no less can we infer from the characterization of Christ and those who heal under his strict directions as "medical frauds."

England furnishes the case of the death of Reuben Vaughan, aged four years and four months, at Grays. His parents belonged to the sect known as the Peculiar People. On the father being asked by the coroner what it was that doctors were sent for if not to be used, he replied that those who love the Lord prefer oil and faith. The coroner said he "wished these people would come to their senses." A good way to help get them back to their senses, we suggest, would be for him, the coroner, to drop the allegiance that—we are justified in presuming—he pays to the Christian church. His church rests upon divine deliverances of which one of the most explicit is the command to use oil and faith. If this is not to be heeded, none are to be heeded. If for people to obey this is to go out of their senses, then it appears not unlikely that for them to obey the others is to go out of their senses. If the coroner feels as something deplorable this result of following a scriptural precept, it would, we should think, naturally occur to him to look about and see whether there are not to be found a good many more deplorable results of following other scriptural precepts.

Editorial Notes.

THROUGH the influence and hard work of a few Freethinkers, the Freethought society of Buffalo, N. Y., which since 1881 has slept the sleep of the blessed though scarcely that of the just, has been aroused. Lectures and debates are held, and the Freidenker informs us that the attendance is generally above the average at public meetings. There are many dozing societies here in the United States. To all of them we say, Wake up! Never more than now was organization needed.

"OUR MEDIUM" JULIA M. KELLOGG, of San Diego, Cal., asks for copies of one of THE TRUTH SEEKER pictures, "in compliance with the desire of our good brother D. M. Bennett, who has visited us many times." Mrs. Kellogg indorses a pamphlet, "The Tiny Raps, by D. M. Bennett, on the Papal Tariff, through Our Medium, Julia M. Kellogg, with Patriotic Devotion and Love of Charity." Mrs. Kellogg must be a remarkably brazen fraud or a very guileless woman. The pamphlet is made up of extracts from the writings of D. M. Bennett, Colonel Ingersoll, and others, changed to suit Mrs. Kellogg's spiritual views and claims of mediumship, and is a dishonest production. If her business transactions are not more honest than her mediumship we should prefer to make her a present of what she desires rather than to sell it to her.

THE Baptist churches of Middletown township, N. J., are having hard luck. There are four churches of this denomination in the township, and three of them hav been struck by lightning this year, and the season is not very far advanced either. First the Baptist church at Chanceville was struck, then the steeple was torn off the Baptist church at Middletown, and a few days ago the Baptist church at Atlantic Highlands was struck. The only other Baptist church in the township is at Navesink, and it is said that every time there is a thunder-storm the people of that church are in a painful state of mingled expectation and dread until the storm is over. No hotels or saloons in Middleton township hav been struck. This selection of ecclesiastical structures for providential wrath will, however, hav little effect on the belief of the Christians about, that their faith is continually attested by signs and wonders, while Infidels are perpetually being stricken dumb in the act of blaspheming, or otherwise significantly chastised.

Letters from Friends.

DANVILLE, ILL., July 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hope there is no possibility of the pictures being dropped. They make THE TRUTH SEEKER the Truth Finder and the Truth Teller. S. W. LOUTZENHISER.

BROMFIELD, NEB., July 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: There are plenty of skeptics around here, but I hav not been able to induce any of them to subscribe. The most of them do not like to take the paper because their wives would not like it. MRS. P. GULICK.

HUBBELL, NEB., July 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I ought to take the first opportunity to help and support, for it is my greatest desire to see our cause thrive and prosper, and it is my wish to become a member of your ranks in file. But that is one of our impossibilities in the village of Hubbell, for although there is a small number of Freethinkers they hav never been aroused.

MRS. O. SLOPANSKY.

CARLISLE, IA., July 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I tried to get you some subscribers, but it is up-hill business here. I am the only one here that will speak out openly and fight the so-called Christians, and as I am in business I am boycotted on every hand.

Continue the pictures, by all means, as they show up the old Jew Bible in all its hideousness, and giv the common people an opportunity to discover the fraud of priestcraft.

M. GUISINGER.

AUBURN, IA., July 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Within find renewal and a new subscriber for one year, and you can count two more votes for the pictures. Many thanks for your kindness in sending the paper so long after my year expired. I will try and be more prompt in the future. Were I able I would gladly do something for Heston, but being a poor Infidel I must be content with wishing you all success in your endeavors to spread the light and truth to all mankind. E. M. CARE.

BURTON, July 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER much. It is a grand paper, fearless and true. Long may it continue to do its noble work. I am pleased that it givs fair play to Spiritualism, and does not mock or deride. Examin carefully, without fear or favor, and you will find a great and comforting truth, and one that can stand near approach and close investigation. Great souls "over there" return to aid us in all honorable affairs of life—but do not clip our own responsibility. D. HIGBIE, M.D.

BOWIE, TEX., July 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Believing there are many Freethought people desirous of learning something definit about Texas and its agricultural, horticultural, mineral, and various other industries; price of lands; water; health, etc., I would be pleased to answer inquiries. I hav been a resident fourteen years. I am a mechanic. I hav a desire to induce Freethought people wishing to come this way to settle in this part. We hav quite an element of Freethinkers here and hav a good society, and would welcome all Freethinking people. Please inclose two-cent stamp when writing for information.

Go for 'em, Heston. S. P. BENTON.

MILTON, N. D., July 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to hav you say, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I hav got Secular meetings started in Milton. We meet every Sunday at 4 o'clock P.M.

Mr. John Marshall, lawyer, givs his office free of charge. The clergy kicks, of course. Nevertheless, we hav from twelve to twenty-five in attendance.

Mr. Marshall and myself read Ingersoll, Remsburg, Putnam, H. H. Gardener, and other authors of the Secular stripe. Mr. Marshall is a clear and forcible speaker, and I think we shall be able to counteract in some degree the pernicious influence of orthodoxy.

Yours for truth, justice, and liberty, S. E. HAIGHT.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., July 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose payment for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The best thing about the paper is, it does not break freedom's back with a load of filth. Manure is good in its place, but it is not in good taste to hav it in the sugar-bowl. All the same, it is a shame to damn a man for bad diction. It is evident enough that Heywood, Harman, etc., are jumped upon for their words, because the Christian cranks can get no other legal hold to try to stop free speech. I would like to hav Heston make a picture of the Bible propped up by joss-sticks, or joss-sticks propped up by the Bible, for Chinamen to swear by in court, as mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago. I shall want the picture book. J. P. GUILD.

GYMPIE, AUSTRALIA, June 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Keep on with the pictures, as they are good eye-openers, and I like them myself. Many will look at the pictures that would not read the paper. I am glad to see you are going to hav them in book form, for I hav often thought they would make a good family Bible, and I saved mine all up for the first year for that purpose, but when anyone sees them that will accept them I giv them away and lend them out, so I hav but very few in hand. I think they will do good, as people like to read them, and if it was not so far away I believe some of them would subscribe to your most loved paper. Liberalism is spreading, as the people are beginning to think for themselvs. But there are still a great many that hold to Mother Grundy's superstitions and cannot come out of the fog to the light of common sense, and will not till they trust to man instead of their God. Please count me one for the picture book. When I see they are ready I will send the money; and may they long continue. Yours for faith, C. FORMAN.

LETCHER, CAL., July 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It is painful to find that some Liberals in name are so illiberal as to find fault with those who hav the courage to stand up to their convictions of right and to giv expression to the same, and defend the rights of others to do likewise. I hav just read an article in Freethought, by O. S. Barrett, in which he advises that the writings of Elmina D. Slenker should be suppressed. But I hav failed to see in all she writes anything that is of an unkind or immoral nature. She has ever been foremost with pen and purse for the assistance and alleviation of truth and distress, under all circumstances, a true sister of charity, as many can testify; and to her many as well as myself are indebted for packages of choice literature from week to week; and to show how liberal she really is, she sends all kinds of periodicals, both Spiritual as well as Materialistic. Now, for one who has thus grown out of the narrow grooves of selfishness of beliefs or disbeliefs, to be called upon to lay down her arms—pen—is, to say the least, equivalent to asking her to become a traitor to the cause of right she has enlisted, with a host of other brave men and women, to defend. Unless the so-called Liberals shall stand together in the work of preparing the way for a higher civilization and purer lives and juster forms of government, the machinations of the enemies of freedom will dethrone liberty and ere long enshroud the world in the darkness of the Middle Ages.

LUNA HUTCHINSON.

PAULINE, ARK., July 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a new subscriber. The ball keeps rolling and the good work is slowly but surely gaining ground. There are quite a number of Liberals here but we are unorganized, and of course unable to do good fighting. The Christians are preparing for another Brush Arbor meeting such as they had last summer. Then all the Christians will hav another opportunity of shouting themselvs hoarse, and whooping so loudly and long they will no doubt again excite all the dogs in the neighborhood to pitiful, mournful howls. If this work continues from year to year the little heaven that John saw will soon be full of Arkansas snuff-takers.

This is the home of Dr. W. R. Bachelor, a stanch Liberal and a true friend of humanity. The doctor was expelled from the Masonic fraternity a few years ago for writing the pamphlet, "Fiat Lux." He is a poor man but does what he can to free the minds of his fellow-men from the awful fear of an imaginary hereafter. "Fiat Lux" is a "candid inquiry into biblical harmonies." The price of this work is twenty-five cents. I hav twenty-five copies and will sell all or any number of them at twenty cents each, and giv the entire proceeds to assist Messrs. Harman or Heywood, or both, in their struggle with Comstock & Co. Any of our Liberal friends who would like to hav the book and at the same time assist in maintaining free speech and a free press, can giv twenty cents to the proper authorities to assist either Harman or Heywood, and I will send the book free by mail. Hoping to hear from at least twenty-five of our Liberal friends on the subject, I am, R. HENRY HAWKINS.

July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: For some time past I hav directed my attention to reading the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and notice you hav quite a number of contributors who, in a carnal sense, might be considered shrewd observers of events and doings. Do you know you hav a great responsibility resting upon you as a director of the thoughts of mankind? For thus it appears to one who nightly sleeps with the holy word of God, the Bible, under his pillow.

It takes little argument with me to show the wrath of God is upon the doings of this generation. We can readily observe this to be a very reckless and daring generation, but still not without its parallel, as fully journalized in the Bible. The fall of Sodom and Gomorrah should act as a caution. No doubt these ancient sinners were indulging in abominable amusements in violation of the holy Sabbath, in every sinful variety—horse-racing, wrestling, ground and lofty tumbling, quoit-pitching, and so forth—when an enraged God showered his sulphur and flames on their heads. But the pious and virtuous Lot, warned by the angel, retreated from the doomed place with his family, and was saved; but alas, his wife, recollecting the fascinations of Sodom, looked back, and was instantly transformed into a pillar of salt, which stands to this day, and of which Brother Talmage has obtained a large chunk.

I hav been fearful you seldom read the holy Bible, or if you do it is done through carnal eyes. But I repeat again you hav an awful responsibility resting upon you. But it is never too late to repent, for "by faith ye are saved." Holy Christian faith is a great panacea and magical invigorator of the soul, the want of which, no doubt, the miserable Dives suffered. We read in holy writ that in hell he lifted up his eyes and besought a drop of water of the pious Abraham to cool his parched tongue. A Christian can easily imagin how our saintly father Abraham smilingly shook his pious head.

We want no repetition of the warnings of an angry God! Do these portentous indications of disturbances surrounding us—cyclones, tempests, and hurricanes—hav no meaning? O God, defend us!

The rude intrusion of creatures calling themselvs scientists, as it were rushing wildly into God's private laboratory, is surely a divine insult. And more daring still, through something they call Spiritualism they are endeavoring to make God explain himself. But mark how quick the retribution—"for God will not be mocked"—the burning of all the electrical apparatus of the Western Union!

I doubt, from the known earthly or carnal reasonings of your associates, if you believe in prayer, but you just try it once. I can vouch for it. It is a healthy exercise. If not for yourself, pray for the souls of some of your contributors—Longshore, Peck, and Elmina. Dreadful the thought that, like Dives, in hell they should be looking up. CALVIN.

BENEVOLA, MD., July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: On the 2d of July Brother D. H. Newcomer, of Benevola, Washington county, Md., after a lingering illness, died. He was no member of any religious denomination, and during the last year became a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which he seemed to enjoy very much. He was so Liberal that he gave the ground for the United Baptist church, which is located about one hundred and fifty yards from where he lived and died. While his mind was strong naturally and so developed by much reading that he could see the inconsistency of churches generally, yet, as he knew his friends wanted to build a church near him, and that many of them meant everything for the best, he thus far helped them.

He was unassuming and quiet in his manner, although elected to the house of delegates and once to the state senate, and a bank director upward of forty years. His age was seventy-five years four months and twenty-five days, and his good and noble wife and five children, four sons and one daughter, survive him. The youngest of the children is thirty-five years, and to the honor of the family it can be said so far the black sheep that is the trouble of every family has not put in his appearance, which I credit to the true home training.

The deceased was buried on the 6th, on Sunday. After a few appropriate remarks at the house by Rev. D. F. Stouffer of the German Baptists, and Joshua Harp of the United Baptist church, his neighbors, who knew him well and spoke as well of him as if they expected to meet him and associate with him in the beautiful hereafter as they had associated here, his fellow-bank directors and a large concourse of people accompanied the body to the old Farkneys meeting house burying-ground, where we know it will rest no more unassuming than in life, until all may learn that true greatness is honesty and simplicity of life.

As a friend and sometimes a very intimate associate of deceased during the last forty years, I only wish that all true Liberals, or those who remain outside the churches, might liv the truly honorable lives, and leave behind them the same kind of good children, as monuments to their virtues. Large marble monuments in fashionable cemeteries, with recklessly raised children depending on others for a living, and on God for all the good or bad they do, seem to me poor representativs of our virtues while living. JOHN M. GROH.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., July 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find stamps for pardon blanks for Messrs. Harman and Reid. We intend to circulate them among the Liberals of this city, and thus do our share toward righting the wrong that Christian fanaticism has inflicted upon an awful Infidel and so-called foolish Spiritualist. The writer differs somewhat with Mr. Harman's views, and most radically from those of Mr. Reid, but in spite of all diversity in opinions and belief, he recognizes the fact that both men are victims of blind Christian fanaticism.

As THE TRUTH SEEKER undoubtedly reaches scores of Liberals in this section who are unacquainted with the San Antonio Secular Society, I hope that you will giv me a little space to state some facts about it.

This society was temporarily organized March 7, 1890, at the close of a lecture given here by Mr. John E. Remsburg. Soon after, Mr. J. D Shaw was invited to speak here, and after his three lectures the society was permanently organized with a membership of almost ninety. Since then we met every Sunday night, carrying out a program of some kind, until the hot weather compelled us to postpone the meetings until August. These meetings will be resumed erelong, and every Liberal who passes through the city is cordially invited to attend them.

The society has adopted the American Secular Union constitution, and boldly stands up for the total separation of the church from the state. Its membership fee is twenty-five cents, and monthly dues the same. The membership is not confined to citizens of San Antonio, and has a number of members in small cities all over the state where they are not strong enough to organize themselvs. We hope that all of the Liberals outside of the city who would like to aid the cause, but are in a like position, will follow the example that has been set, and send in their names, addresses, and membership fees.

The society circulates among its members at home all of the Freethought literature they want for their own use and for missionary purposes, and it sends bundles of such reading-matter to all of its members in other towns and villages, who wish to spread them among their friends and neighbors, and there is no doubt but that some good comes from it. As a consequence of our work in that direction, our supply of literature is almost exhausted, and we are compelled to call upon the Liberals who can spare any such literature to send it on, for, while the San Antonio Secular Society is not at present in a condition to perform anything in the legislature of the state, it will exert all its power in educating the masses up to the aims and objects of Liberalism, so that when we are firmly organized all over the state our work in the legislature will be comparativly easy. With an aim so practicable and laudable, every Liberal in the state ought to come forward and aid us in every possible manner.

Before closing, I must mention the death of Mr. Frank Donaldson, a member of our society, and a subscriber to your paper. He was conscious till the last few minutes, emphatically declaring that he wanted no preacher near his grave, and his was one of the numerous strictly Secular funerals that occur in this city. OTTO PRAEGER,
Secretary San Antonio Secular Society.

RED CANON, WYO., July 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Every priest, preacher, and bishop—be he Catholic, Protestant, or Mormon—is a slavemaker and a slaveholder.

A religious sect, as it becomes stronger, becomes jealous of any authority except its own.

The more allegiance an individual holds toward his church the more treason he has sworn against the government; he has ceased to be an honest partner of the nation, but, whipped under the lash of fear, and fascinated by illusiv chimeras of hope, he has given himself into slavery to the priest or preacher, and believes that he must love his church better than his country, his Jesus more than his family.

To-day the Catholic church is the most powerful corporate body in the world, and the question will soon be tested whether or not she will run this government.

Catholicism is reason-proof, and no logic but that of force can ever reach her vital centers.

Yet this government considers non-resistant policy to be more democratic, therefore more just. If non-resistance is the correct policy of a good government why should not government be non-resistant in all things, leaving individuals to look out for themselvs as best they can?

Wherever we see a religious sect there we see an organized power that would usurp the power of government and govern as a despot if it could.

Likely it will take a few centuries more, and several more experiments in government making, several reformations and revolutions, before humanity will learn the cause, cure, and prophylaxis of the diseases from which a government may suffer and finally expire. The world has never yet beheld a healthy government.

Fortunately this government at her birth suffered from no hereditary taint, thanks to Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin, and others of broad and liberal views.

Yet the very fairness, honesty, and equity exercised by the founders of our government left avenues open by which microbes of disease could enter and be treated like gentlemen.

The slimy priest, the hungry blood-loving preacher, were treated with the same respect that is due to men. The doors were open, truth was supposed to issue from ecclesiastical lips callous with lies, their word was taken that they would labor toward the perpetuation of a free government where all were treated as equals. They were allowed to indulge in their chosen incantations, and use such influence over the minds of men as they could by playing upon the chords of hope and fear.

The little corporations over which these priests and preachers ruled hav now become powerful, and in subtle ways they are casting disgrace upon the principles of democracy. Soon they will become bolder, and say to the government that let them in and trusted them: "Take a rest and let us govern; we hav a machine of our own invention, named the trinity; it includes a personage named God; he was never married, but he had a son, named J. Christ. William the Conquerer had a similar pedigree, and he was a great monarch. It is our opinion that 'Je.' is just cut out for the ruler of nations; business detains him in heaven just at present, but as we are his vicegerents on earth there will be no trouble at all in providing the American people with an abundance of government. Let us pray!"

Since America has furnished a hot-bed for the growth of the various religious sects, particularly the Catholic, I see no other way than to face the inevitable doom of the future and see ecclesiasticism again hold the reins of government. Sooner or later the people will rebel against her despotism and another republic will be organized. Let us hope that it will not tolerate any organized religious sect.

DR. C. E. BOYNTON.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: According to Christian mythology Jehovah and Lucifer are both supreme in the management of the universe, though it is claimed by the bibliolatrist that Jehovah is just a little bit the "supremest." However, if we are to judge from the display of executiv ability for strategic maneuvering in the sanguinary contest in which these two individuals are engaged, it would be a difficult matter indeed, at the present time at least, to determin exactly what the final result is to be.

At some very remote period of time these two joint proprietors of the universe became involved in a feud, the result, I am led to believe, of a difference of opinion as to who, if either, of the two was entitled to precedence in the management of the universe. This estrangement disrupted the spirit of fraternal affiliation that hitherto had existed between these two individuals, and they at once became diametrically and irreconcilably opposed to each other, and since that time they hav been the great source or fountain-head from which emanates that most diabolical spirit or principle of antagonism which in some mysterious manner, so it is claimed, involves all animate creation in a ceaseless struggle with the forces of nature to perpetuate an existence on the earth. And we are informed by the sagacious wiseacre that has probed deep into the hidden mysteries of bibliology that in a similar manner the irrepressible conflict between right and wrong, the universal antagonism of moral principles, was inaugurated. In relation to this conflict there is no neutral ground. It is claimed that the whole course of nature became subverted, including all animated being. The sensible and the idiotic imbecil were all alike drawn into the dreadful vortex of fratracidal strife and inextricable horror. And all for the express purpose of painting on the canopy of heaven, for the benefit of man and the glory of Jehovah, Lucifer & Co., the beautiful contrast between a state of unalloyed happiness and a condition of ceaseless turmoil and unending strife.

On account of the utter impossibility of adjusting the affairs of the universe to the changes that would inevitably follow, this firm has not been, and is not likely to be, officially dissolved, as in the case of the contemplated alliance between the hostil factions of the Christian religion. These two self-constituted proprietors of the universe suppress the natural feelings of hatred and malevolent vindictivness that wrangle in their breasts one against the other, and for the sake of the common interest they continue to fraternize and coöperate together, each of them at the same time, however, secretly hoping and stealthily conniving for an opportunity to assert his individual supremacy, seize the exclusiv control of the universe, and crush all opposition beneath his feet.

Exactly thus the Christian alliance, after they hav surmounted every obstacle that stands opposed to their accession to universal empire, will waste their energy and strength in fratricidal strife and reënact on the grand stage of the world's theater all the horrors of the Inquisitorial age which like some hideous dream will haunt the blood-stained pages of the world's history for all time to come. We are unable to giv but one apology for the atrocious barbarism that characterized this long, dark, and gloomy period of the world's history. The Christian religion was at that time in the zenith of her power. She swayed the scepter of universal empire. She was at that time mistress of the uncivilized world, the former civilization having succumbed to the chaotic confusion of moral principles that prevailed during this long, uninterrupted period of intellectual night.

Relativly speaking man constitutes but an infinitesimal portion of the universe, and yet it is with man chiefly that Jehovah, Lucifer & Co. hav to do. In fact, so inseparably connected are they that one or the other of these antiquated gentlemen constitutes the second person in the dual nature of which man is possessed, and that for the express purpose of dominating the moral and intellectual nature of man to direct the energies of his mind and body under all the vicissitudes of life, in the most trivial affairs as well as in the most trying emergencies. This second person in the dual nature of man is supposed to point out with the utmost precision and to direct and influence the individual in the way he should go. Now, after a practical test extending through many consecutiv generations, it cannot be denied that this doctrin has exerted a pernicious influence on mankind. It dethrones and degrades the dignity of manhood.

It utterly destroys man's accountability to himself and his fellow-men, the only tribunal to which man is amenable for his conduct. It drags man bound in suppliant chains to the feet of a foreign despot who has been elevated to his lofty and unapproachable position of power by the servil adulation of his willing victim. It makes of man a pliant tool in the hand of a crafty, unscrupulous priesthood, qualified for the perpetration of every imaginable species of intrigue and fraud that may be considered necessary to combat the opposition with which ecclesiasticism has to contend. All the good that may be accomplished through earnest, persistent, well directed effort is attributed to Jehovah, senior member of the firm. Man receives credit only as the instrument or machine through which Jehovah & Co. are supposed to exhibit their power. All the dark and infamous crimes that men commit are charged either directly or indirectly to his satanic majesty, junior member of the firm, and man virtually escapes the responsibility of his conduct and thus becomes a nonentity equal in infinit nullity to the one that existed prior to the time that Jehovah, Lucifer & Co. created the universe out of no-thing. If you are a well-disposed person and practice virtue for its own sake; if you alleviate suffering by acts of kindness and expressions of sympathy; if you pick up the fallen and restore the castaway to the bosom of society, family, and friends, and by gentle admonition and kind reproof keep others from falling, you are entitled to no credit. You are given to understand that you are but an unworthy worm of the dust, conceived in sin and born in iniquity; that of yourself you can do nothing; that you are but clay in the plastic hand of the great I am, and that it is God that works into you the will or disposition to do his pleasure. On the other hand, if you squander the gifts of a bountiful providence in riotous living and become a vagrant in the world; if you shed innocent blood; if you allure the innocent and confiding from the path of virtue; if you desecrate the family hearthstone and wreck the happiness of the domestic circle; if you are recreant to every principle of justice and every sacred trust that has been placed in your care, and your intelligence recognizes the hideous deformity of your wretched, depraved nature, you escape the responsibility of your conduct by laying the blame all on Satan. You believe in an overruling providence that directs the actions of man. You hav been taught that all things are in perfect harmony with the divine mind; that nothing is allowed to occur contrary to the will of God. You argue that if God engages in world-making the probability is that he will create exactly the kind of a world he desires to hav; that the existence of the world has been perpetuated without any change except through the inexplicable law of natural evolution. Confirm your faith in this conclusion. You hav heard of a certain class described by the apostle Peter as having eyes full of adultery; that cannot cease to do evil; beguiling unstable souls. You feel that you belong to this class; that you are the emissary of Satan, employed by Jehovah as were the lying spirits of old, and thus filling your place in the grand scheme of heaven's appointment just as it may happen to suit the caprice of him that works all things after the counsel of his own will; that subordinates every opposing power; that surmounts every difficulty; that rules among the children of men, and, as Daniel says, tears down kingdoms and builds up kingdoms, and places over them the basest of men.

The conclusion, therefore, cannot be avoided, that according to Christian mythology man is simply a machine, moving only as he is moved, acting only as he is influenced or impelled to act by some extraneous motiv or subtle influence over which he has no control, and that acting through the avenues of the senses impels or irresistibly carries him along in many instances contrary to his own conception of justice and propriety, and in every case utterly helpless, unable to resist the power of that immutable law that makes of man an automatic machine grander and more sublime in its wonderful mechanism than everything that has ever been on exhibition in the grand art museums of the world. Of course, it is urged that man is free to act; that he is unrestrained; that he may use his own volition. Admit this to be true and yet the fact remains that man is compelled to choose between two masters, and if compelled he can not be free. He must submit to the inevitable. This machine, by virtue of a protectiv tariff for revenue only, is monopolized and manipulated by and in the exclusiv interest of Jehovah, Lucifer & Co.; though it seems strange that the individual interest of these two joint proprietors could be advanced in this way, but such, however, is the case. It is somewhat remarkable that no other invention has been discovered that could be utilized with profit by the above-mentioned firm. This firm is known throughout the habitable earth by the name of Jehovah, Lucifer & Co., the head clerk and subordinate manager of all offices being known to the general public as the Holy Ghost, but who is familiarly known and addressed by the principal managers at the home office by the significant cognomen, "the comforter." He modestly accepts the title as a recognition of special merit. And be it known that this ghost never fails to materialize as the self-same individual ghost at any number of different localities, though the points at which his presence may be required are as remote from one another as the antipodes, if by so doing the interest of the home office can be advanced and built up.

This symmetrical, complex machine, man, possessed with such wonderful adaptability, has been in constant use from time immemorial, and by some mysterious, inscrutable law regulating the transmutation of primal germs this wonder-working machine has acquired the habit of reproducing itself, so that when musty with age, and when corroding time has marred the beautiful consistency of its symmetrical structure, and it is without ceremony or regrets cast aside and consigned to perpetual desuetude, its place is at once filled with another one in perfect working trim, without any additional cost to the Company. So it may be seen that from the remotest period of time there has been one constant, uninterrupted activity of this celebrated firm in the employment of this machine. This machine when not under the immediate supervision of the senior member is superintended, with an approximate degree of success, by the junior member of the firm. In fact, it is generally conceded that he is the most skilful of the two in the manipulation of this wonderful machine.

The phonographic capacity of this machine is remarkable. Not long since we witnessed the rendering of a piece that had been stereotyped or registered on the sensitiv foil of one of those machines by that still, small voice of which clerical gentlemen hav so much to say and by which they hav received the most astounding revelations, which they claim are a perfect transcript of the divine mind. The rendering to which we refer was indeed a revelation to me, for it declared in the most emphatic terms that the irreligious person recognizes himself to be inferior in every way to the higher type of orthodox Christians, and that he can only hope to compare with credit, in the eye of an intelligent public as well as in his own estimation, with the lowest type of immoral parasites and loathsome scavengers that so multitudinously infest, and flourish in, the orthodox camp. Such egotistical phariseeism is not to be expected and is seldom met with from any other source.

The individual that does good from his own spontaneous impulse, without the fear of punishment or the hope of reward, is infinitly superior to the frigid, callous nature that can be moved to acts of charity and love only by the spectacle of a mangled, bleeding, crucified savior, the terrors of a burning pit, or selfish, irrepressible desire for a crown of glory and a harp of gold.

A continual dropping will melt a stone. This truism is demonstrated by a retrospectiv view of my past efforts as a Freethought propagandist. Eight years ago there was not to my knowledge an outspoken Infidel in my immediate neighborhood, except myself, but having imbibed an aggressiv spirit I resolved myself into a nucleus from which the radiating principles of Freethought hav illuminated the minds of a small number, that hav revolted against the galling chains of priestcraft and mental serfdom; and the result is we hav secured three subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER in less than one year, and expect as many more in a very short time.

I am not in favor of Heston's cartoons. In my judgment they do more harm than good as an iconoclast. The paper that finds its way into the greatest number of orthodox homes is the one that will achieve the grandest success.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Betwesn the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

" ittle Brown Hands."

They drive home the cows from the pasture
Up through the long shady lane,
Where the quail whistles loud in the wheat field,
All yellow with ripening grain.

They find, in the thick, waving grasses,
Where the scarlet-lipped strawberry grows;
They gather the earliest snowdrops,
And the first crimson buds of the rose.

They toss the hay in the meadow,
They gather the elder blooms white,
They find where the dusky grapes purple
In the soft-tinted October light.

They know where the apples hang ripest,
And are sweeter than Italy's wines;
They know where the fruit is the thickest
On the long, thorny blackberry vines.

They gather the delicate sea-weeds,
And build tiny castles of sand;
They pick up the beautiful sea-shells—
Fairy barks that hav drifted to land.

They wave from the tall, rocking tree-tops,
Where the oriole's hammock nest swings,
And at night-time are folded in slumber
By a song that a fond mother sings.

Those who toil bravely are strongest;
The humble and poor become great;
And from those brown-handed children
Shall grow mighty rulers of state.

The pen of the author and statesman—
The noble and wise of our land—
The sword and chisel and palet,
Shall be held in the little brown hand.

Brother Johnson's Sermon.

[Hon. A. B. Bradford sends the sermon below for the enjoyment of the readers of the Corner, little and big. The sermon contains the sparkle of genuin humor as well as some grains of wholesome truth. It was taken stenographically on the spot, and is a fine specimen of negro preaching. Mr. Bradford has our thanks for his kindness and also for his appreciativ words relating to our work in this department of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We trust always to merit his approval.—ED. C. C.]

"The destruction of the poor is their poverty" (Prov. x, 15).

De tex' what I take on dis occasion is from de book of Proverbs. De learned scholars says dat old Massa Solomon wrote dis yer book. Ef he did, he ought to be called de werry wisest ob men, kase a proverb is as full ob wisdom as an egg is full ob meat; and as a hungry man likes to eat a nice stuffed possum wiv plenty ob graby, so a smart preacher lubs to study on a proverb, and pick de bones ob it clean. My tex' is one ob dat kind. I hab been intending for a long time to preach on dis yer tex', for I hab been studyin' on it eber since befo' de war, in de cabin and in de cornfield. Some time ago, my ole massa, what used to be, tole me dat Mista Jorge, away up in New York, had got up in dat town what dey calls a anty-pove'ty s'ciety, an dat he prints a paper ebry week to help on de doin' away wiv poverty altogether. So I gived de ole man de money to pay fer it, an axed him to send an git de paper. I hab been readin' ob dis yere paper for a long time. Dere is a good many hard words in it what I can't ezackly understand, but my darter Lizey what goes to de school has got a dixiniary, as dey calls it, what clears up de meanin' ob de big words, and when I gits run up a stump, my darter, she comes wiv de book, and tells me de meanin' ob dem, so I can see what Mr. Jorge is dribin' at. On dis account I now feel more able to preach on dis tex dan I eber was befo; and as all ob us niggas hab become free by Massa Lincum's proclumation durin' de waar; and as we had such a big bellyful ob povity while we was all slabes, I want to do what I can to git you, and myself, too, out ob dat destruction what de tex says a pore man is in, jes kase he is pore.

My brederin, I hab obsarved, sence I quit bein' a slabe, dat amung de white folks, as well as de black people, dis yer povity is de biggest ob cusses, kaze it produces a lot ob oder cusses. It minds me ob a sow which sometimes has as many as a dozen pigs at a litter. Indeed, I knowed a sow of ole Masta Brown's what had fifteen pigs at once, which is more dan she had tits to suck. Of course, dere must be a lot of runts. Jes so, my brederin', wiv poverty. It is a great breeder; and I propose on dis yer occasion, wiv de help ob de Lawd, to call your attention to some ob de ebils which povity is de moder ob, and which causes so many runts and mean pigs among de human folks.

1. De fust cuss ob povity is envy. De scripter says dat envy is de rottenness ob de bones. I think dis is in de book of proverbs, too. Now, ef a pusson's bones if rotten, how de debil could he hoe corn, or pick cotton, or dribe a plow in a stumpy field? (Here an old woman in the audience sung out from the far end of the room: "Brudder Johnsing, you must quit yo ole practice ob swearin', now yo got to be a preacher ob de eberlastin' gospel." The preacher resumed.) Well, brederin, it is a fac' dat I used to swaar a good deal in old slabery times. When de slavedriber licked my pore cousin what had de rumatiz in his jintes so dat he could not keep up wid de rest ob us, I could not help but coss him, when he went away, he was so hard-hearted. I felt good clear down to my toes ef I could cuss him right smart. I hab been tryin' to git red ob dis swearin' eber since I begun to preach de everlastin' gospel, but a bad habit I find, especially swearin', sticks to a fellow like a briar-bush to a sheep's tail, and every now and den de cusses pops out ob his mouf widout any notice dey is comin'.

Well, I was gwine to say, when Sista Jones hauled me ober de coals for swearin', dat envy was de fust ebil dat comes ob povity. A pore young woman, when she comes to meetin' on Sunday, looks round on all de sistas to see how dey is dressed, and when she finds dat dey all hab better close on dan she has she experences dis feelin' ob envy. She don't see why all de rest has nice close, and nice bonnet and ribbons, and she has none. So she sits down and sulks like a bauky hoss. She don't seem to know dat dese nice dressed gals works hard durin' de week, and gits de money what helps to git de close. She is too lazy or too stubborn to work, keys her bones are rotten wid envy. De nex' Sunday she comes to meetin' wid a mighty fine bonnet on, and all drest up, and some gole rings in her yers, and on her fingers, and a sealskin sack. Den de sistas looks at her, jis as she looked at dem befo', and wonders how she could afford to dress so fine, so werry soon, when she was so pore. De next go-off she is arrested, and taken' to jail for stealin'. All dis comes ob envy, and envy comes ob povity, and de destruction and ruin ob de pore is dere povity. All de rest of you gals works hard and lays up yo money, and den you can git nice dresses dat you can pay fer, and feel brave, kaze you know dey is paid for. But de young woman I speak ob had dis envy in her heart, and it made her eyes green, and her bones rotten, and so she went to de prison. How mean, and like de pore white trash, she must feel dere, when she minds what she did wid her young mistress nice close, stead of dressin' like de rest ob de culled sistas, and feelin' dat she earned ebery stitch she wore. But dat isn't de wust ob it. Stealin' is bad, and gwine to prison and bein' shut up in a cage like a bear, is bad, but to be ashamed ob one's own self is a good deal wusser. Ef a pusson knows dat he is innocent ob what is laid agin him, dey may send him to jail, but he is happy, kaze ef he has unjustly lost de respect of de people, he still keeps his own. De 'postle Paul was put into de jail once, all alone, and for no good cause, but he had no occasion to duke his head when he passed de lookin' glass hangin' on de wall, for fear he would see de pictur ob a mean skunk. He could look de debil in de face, and tramp upon his tail, and feel like a man, kaze he knowed he had done no harm.

I suspect dat all ober dis country dere is a big amount ob misery growin' out ob envy. De class of pore white folks dat squatted on rich folks' land, and neber worked, but jes hunted and fished for dere libben befo' de war, is misrabler dan de darkeys; and when dey see any ob de culled people doin' business, and gittin' well off, and dere childen dressin' good and goin' to school, dis envy makes dem feel down in de mouf. No wonder dey eats clay and drinks rye coffee, and de wimmens rubs snuff and de childens don't go to school keze dey is so ragged. De povity strikes in on dem like de measles, and kills all dere ambition, and dey jes wegetate, as Brudder Corning says, like taters in a hill, and cabbages in a patch, what ain't hoed any. I tell you, my bredrin, dat povity cuts de hamstrings ob a man, and lets him down to de ground. A white preacher I heard ob once went ebery Saturday night to one ob his rich men and borrowed $50, and he always took it back a Monday mawnin'. After awhile de rich man axed him about dis custom, what for he borrowed de money and didn't use it. De preacher tole him dat he did use it, but didn't spend it, kaze he put de money in his jacket pocket on de left side to make him feel brave when he preached to de sinners. He said he felt like a poor, cowardly cuss when he preached to de people what had property, and remembered dat he hisself had nothing in dis yere world but a wife and nine children at home and one mule, who couldn't go to meetin' kaze dey had no good close. But when he stood behind a $50 bill, even if he didn't own it, he could feel brave as a lion, and make de sinners tremble wid fear. Dere is nothing, my brederin, dat takes de starch out ob a man, and makes him feel like a wet rag, like povity.

2. In de next place povity destroys poor people by taking away from dem dere pride.

When de Lawd was a mixin' up ob de clay in de Gardin ob Eden to make de fust man out ob, he had a lump ob pride what he was gwine to use in makin' ob his backbone. He wanted to stiffin it so dat he would walk straight and neber would stoop down to do a mean thing. But while de Lawd was walking around in de cool ob de day, de debbil slipped up, and stole it away so dat ole Massa Adam had no stiffenen in his backbone. De Lawd tole him not to eat de fruit ob a certain tree in de garden, ef he did it would ruin him. But when de woman come to him one day wid an apron full ob apples, she axed him to stoop down she wanted to tell him something. Den he spied a nice apple. Den she put it to his nose, and it made his mouf water. Den she tole him she had been eatin' some, and it made her so wise dat she knowed a good many things she didn't know before. Den, my brederin, de fat was in de fire, for he eat de apple and de Lawd found it out and cussed him for it! Ef de pore ole man had been too proud to stoop, how different dis world would be from what it is! Yes, pride is one of de werry best things in a man. It makes him walk perpendickeler and not slantindickeler, so dat he neber falls on his nose.

Here was another interruption from Mrs. Jones, a tall, spare, widow woman, who evidently had a pretty good mind, and who said: "Brudder Johnsing, whar abouts in de scriptur you find dat what you say in de garden ob Eden about de debbil's doing?" The preacher resumed: "Sister Jones, ef you feels dat you can preach de eberlastin' gospel better dan me, you better try it de nex' Sunday. You axes werry foolish questions. I is the servant ob de Lawd to preach de eberlastin' gospel and you is de hearer. De scholars in school neber disputes wiv de teacher. Dey jes believe what dey is told. Ef you is 'ligus you jes believe what de preacher says wivout axin' queshons. It is dis axin' ob queshons which de debbil puts people up to what plays de debbil wiv religion. De 'postle says dat we is saved by faith, not by axin' ob queshons. So, Sister Jones, ef you want to be saved, listen to de preacher ob de eberlastin' gospel and shut yo mouf. Some pussons has got de idee dat it is wicked to be proud. But dere is two kinds ob pride—one good and one bad. When a gal finds out at de lookin' glass dat she is werry putty, den she cocks up her nose at de rest what ain't so putty, and steps around among de sisters jes like a peacock in de barnyard struttin' among de dunghill fowls, to show dem what a nice tail he has got. He tries his best to hide his legs wiv his wings, kaze dey is so ugly. De chickens dey likes to see de eyes in de tail, but when dey squint down and see de legs dey says, 'Golly, how ugly dey is!' But what right has de peacock to be so proud ob his tail? It was de Lawd dat gib it to him. Ef he made de tail hisself, den he had a right to feel proud, but seein' he didn't, his pride is ob de bad kind. So, when a man what is very pore gits rich kaze his grandfather has left him a fortune, he scorns to talk to his old friends who is still pore, and gits de disease ob de big head what kills so many hosses in de West. He forgits, as de 'postle says, de hole ob de pit whaar he was digged up. Dat is de same kind of pride as de peacocks. But de right kind ob pride is whaar a man stands and looks at de povity he finds hisself in, and den stiffenin' up ob his backbone and spittin' on his hands, he swaars dat he will git out ob it and hav some property ob his own or die a tryin'.

Now, povity kills a man's pride. Den he quits respectin' ob hisself kase he sees nobody else respect him. Den de bars is down and away he goes to de debbil. Den he has de hang-dog feelin', as ole Uncle Joe said he had when he was kotched in de Widow Wilkins chicken pen one night. Uncle Joe used to swear a little, and said he felt like a damn mean slink ob a niggah. In de slabery times we was all lazy, and thieves and liars and rascals, kaze we was all pore and didn't own nothin'—not eben ourselvs or our children. How could we be anything else? We always kept, like de pore white trash, four or five dogs, so we might feel dat we had some property anyhow. De man inside ob us was all covered up and most dead wiv de rubbish dat povity piled up on us. But when Massa Lincum knocked de chains off from our limbs by makin' ob us free we sperunced a new kind ob feelin'. We got crazy to learn to read and write and cipher and git some land, so dat we might hab a home and make a good libben out ob it. Land and liberty to own and work it for ourselvs, dat's what makes a man diffrunt from a hoss.

3. De next cuss dat povity inflics on a pore man is to dribe him to de saloon. When a man is right pore, and has dis hang-dog feelin' dat ole Uncle Joe tells ob, he gits down, down, werry low. All around him is dark and hopeless. He feels dere is no use of doin' nothing, kaze his eyes is sot, jes like a dead hosses. Den he goes to de saloon; alas, he meets a lot of fellows jes as pore as hisself, and dey frow in dere pennies, and fills dere bellies wiv rot-gut whisky, and when de whisky works, dey forgits dere povity, and dey all feels big and rich, and talks about buyin' farms and racehosses, and goin' up to New York to see Massa Barnum's show; and all de time de pore debbils, all put together, hasn't money enough to buy a ticket to Baltimo'. Den, when dey go home, and see only pone on de table, and all de whisky is out ob dem, dey feel wusser den eber. It is not de drinkin' what makes dem pore, it is de povity what cuts dere hamstrings and dribes dem to drink. Ef dey hav good wittles to eat, and good coffee to drink, and some books to read, and no debts or rents to pay, and no dogs to fill de house wib fleas and eat dere heads off ebery week, dey would not want to go to de saloon, and drink rot-gut, and smoke dock leaf terbaca. I tell you, my briderin, Mista Jorge has got de right sow by de yer, and all de pigs too, when he does not accept de invitation ob de Prohibitioness to help dem bail out de Chesapeak Bay in tin pails, while a dozen big ribers is a runnin' into it all de time. Massa Jorge does business wiv a big augur, 'stead of a gimlet, when he says in his paper dere is no use tryin' to empty de bay wiv tin pails; but dat de wise way is to cut off de streams up in de mountains, or dry dem up. What he means by dis parable is, dat it is povity dat leads to drunkenness, and not drunkenness to povity; dat povity discourages a man, but if he had a farm and a nice home, and good close, and a little money comin' in to him, he would be so happy wiv his family dat he wouldn't want to go to de grog-shop, and craze hisself wiv whisky. Povity makes everybody dat is well off despise a poor man, and can he 'spect hisself when nobody else 'spects him? Dat's why I said dat de biggest loss for a man to hav is to lose his pride. It is jes like a steamboat a losin' of its steam.

Hole on to yo seat, now, Sista Jones! I know what you is gwine to say, dat ef happiness comes ob havin' plenty ob money, den Mister Gole, away up in New York, who, dey say, has more dan a million ob dollars, must be de most happiest man en de world. But he isn't, for Mister Gole is a crazy man, and ef all de people in de Norf was not as crazy as he is, dey would send him to de hospital, and de doctors would put blisters on his head for bein' crazy. You all look scaared at dis, but I am right. What would you think of me ef I would come to meetin' nex' Sunday wid six obercoats on? One obercoat is good and comfortable, but ef I would struggle wid my wife in tryin' to put on five more, and come into the pulpit foamin' wid sweat, and begin to take off de obercoats, one after de other, de sistas would be whisperin' around dat something was out ob order wid Brudder Johnsing's upper story, where he keeps his wits. We read in de scriptur' about old Agur and his praar to God. Now, jis listen sharp, and I will tell you about it. He says to God in his praar: "Gib me neither povity nor riches." Why not povity, Massa Agar? "Lest I be poor and steal," Massa Agar says. Jis what I has been sayin' to you dis mornin'. I guess dat dere was no 'stilleries in de neighborhood whar Massa Agar libed in dem times, and whar dey made rot-gut, or he would a mentioned stealin ob de neighbors' chickens, and pigs, when he got drunk, and beat his wife and children, and end up in de jail or de gallus.

Listen again. Why should not de Lawd gib you riches, Massa Agar? "Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, who is de Lawd?" Dat is de reason why de blessed Jesus says dat a camel, with a great big lump on his back, could no more go frough de eye ob a darnin needle dan a rich man could enter into de kingdom ob heaben. Now, when Massa Gole knows dis, and piles up de money bags on top ob his back, and comes, and knocks at de strait gate, and axes to be let into de church, kaze de debbil is after him, do you suppose that he can git in? No, he is too full of selfishness. He has denied God as de parent ob de rest ob us, and when de door-keeper talks to him about de Lawd, and his commands to de rich people to consider de pore, and help dem to git on to dere own legs, and not lib on charity, Massa Gole says: "Who de debbil is de Lawd? He didn't own no railroads, nor no stock in de Western Union, or de banks." Massa Gole wants to git in at the narrer gate, and den go up into de city ob de New 'Rusalem, wid his money, to build street railroads, like Massa Jacob Sharp, and make more money. But de saints in dat city don't want no street kyars and no money. De streets demselvs is made ob gole, and de people dat livs dere has got wings on dere shoulders, and flies up and down de broad abenues like swallows ketching flies in summer time, and dem dat has no wings yet skips along de streets wid silver slippers on, and is all covered wid shinin' jewels. Now, isn't Massa Gole as crazy as a bed-bug, when he loads himself down wid more riches dan he can possibly enjoy? Isn't he tryin' to be comfortable wid six overcoats on?

Ole Massa Petah Cooper was a rich man, but he only wore one obercoat at a time. He kept hisself all de time young and happy by usin' his money in doin' good to other people. I neber was in New York, but dey tell me dat Massa Petah built a big house in dat town whar young men and women who was pore could go and learn trades, so dat dey could make a good libben for demselvs, and not run de streets as tramps and wagabones, like so many does. What a taste befo' hand ob heaben Massa Petah had, as he saw, ebery year, dozens ob young men and women gwine out of his big school wiv good trades, and den gwine into business dat would save dem from povity, idleness, and crime, and all de rest ob de cusses! And how happy he must a been, as he lay on his bed a dying, when de blessings of dem he had helped and saved, come up like music in his yers, and lifted de cloud what hangs ober de grave, and let him hab a sight ob de New Rusalem! De ole man was so young and so happy, I hear, dat de New York people got it into dere heads dat he would lib as long as Mathusalem. But he didn't. He died at last, and is now walking up and down de streets of de New 'Rusalem, and gwine in and out ob de pearly gates and enjoyin' hisself wiv ole Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. When he knocked at de gate ob de great city de 'postle Petah, his namesake, what keeps de doors dat swings in, but neber out, says to him: "You is Massa Petah Cooper of New York, I believe, what built de institute in dat town. Walk in, Massa Cooper; dis white kyard will entitle you to a very comfortable seat among de good folks, and dis yer blue one, when you show it to de music master, will entitle you to a golden harp to play on, while here, in dis little bottle, is some Aye's pectoral to keep you from gittin' hoarse in de frost, when you sing de hymns." Yes, my brederin, de man what piles up more money dan he can possibly use, and done enjoy hisself here in doing good wiv his overplush, is a crazy man and a fool, jes as I would be ef I would come to meetin' nex' Sunday, tuggin' and sweatin' along de road wiv five or six obercoats on instead of one. You would suppose, when you looked at my shirt collar and bosom, ef you didn't know what was de matter, dat I had slipped off de log and fell into de crick, I was so wet wiv sweat.

De nex' Sunday, de Lawd willing, I will preach on dis tex', "He dat tilleth his land shall hav plenty ob bread." Let us pray.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

GEN. JOHN C. FREMONT, the noted Western pioneer, is dead.

ON the 21st ult. a tornado ravaged Trail county, N. D., killing seven persons.

THE government of the Argentine Republic has been overthrown by a military conspiracy, and disorder prevails.

IT is said that Bismarck will visit the pope, the move being due to his wife's strong desire to see and consult him.

COMMISSIONER PORTER is reminded from all parts of the country that the errors of his enumerators are simply countless.

REV. ABNER VERNON, of Clarksburg, W. Va., has eloped with the wife of Charles Echols, both leaving large families.

COLORADO has had destructiv storms and floods. Near Golden a cloudburst struck a camping party and drowned three.

ON the 22d ult. a tornado near Marshall, Minn., demolished three farmhouses and injured several persons, perhaps fatally.

ON the 26th ult. a tornado devastated South Lawrence, Mass., and vicinity, wrecking thirty buildings and killing ten persons.

THE potato blight has ravaged large parts of Ireland, and the nativs having sent all their money to the pope, they are menaced by starvation.

BRAZILIANS received a squadron dispatched from our government with enthusiasm as bearer of good will from what they termed "the mother republic."

THE war between San Salvador and Guatemala is being waged furiously. Each side claims victory. The president of Mexico says that that country will not interfere.

THE destitute striking cloakmakers in New York hav done violence to those who filled their places. They are being inflamed by Anarchists, and police are held ready for them.

FIFTEEN French Catholic pastors of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and seven hundred of their parishioners, recently went on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre, Canada.

SECRETARY BLAINE has submitted the Behring sea correspondence to Congress. The text of the British ultimatum conveys a clear threat. The United States is to be "held responsible for seizures."

IN Ohio the Grange, the Alliance, the Farmers' League, the Patrons of Industry, and the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association will carry on a vigorous campaign this fall, endeavoring to send farmers' candidates to Congress.

IN England the queen and all classes are agitated over the exile of the Second Battalion of the Grenadier Guards to foreign service, on the 22d ult., as punishment for insubordination which was fomented among them by Socialists.

CAPT. BENJ. TILLMAN, the gubernatorial candidate of the farmers' party that has grown up so remarkably in South Carolina, conducts his canvass amid unceasing violence, and it is not improbable that he will be killed before election.

INDIANA is exerting herself to crush White Caps. Heavy damages hav been given for the beating of Marion Kendall, resulting in his paralyzation, notwithstanding that his offense had been assault of a girl and that the White Caps who whipped him were respected citizens.

AT Savannah, Ga., on the 24th ult., three lives were lost in the blowing up of a boarding-house, supposedly by a discharged servant. On the 23d ult. the Grand Union Hotel at New York narrowly escaped an incendiary fire which is attributed, though without conclusiv proof, to a scrubwoman who had been reprimanded.

AT the feast of St. John the Baptist, patron saint of the French Canadians, the procession at Montreal, which was two hours in passing, was remarkable for the almost entire absence of the English flag. In former years the rule generally followed was that each society be headed by the English ensign and the tricolor.

AUSTRIAN and German embassadors at Constantinople hav declared to the porte that such events as the capture by brigands of Chief Engineer Gerson and Superintendent Mejor of the Ismidt & Angora railway are too frequent, and that better protection must be given foreigners who are devoting labor or money to public works in Turkey.

THE federal election bill is fomenting much trouble. It is extensivly, but not unanimously, proposed in the South to boycott the North commercially if the bill passes. Negroes fear bad usage will ensue to them from its enforcement. Discussion of the measure at Magazine Logan, Ark., on the 24th ult., resulted in the killing of Capt. Wm. Ellington, who was a Union scout, and his son, by W. D. McInturff, a Southern sympathizer.

Gems of Thought.

CONTINENCE during the years of development rewards itself in health and vigor, both of body and of mind. Success in every line of endeavor is the reward of reserved strength. That strength becomes available in the needs of after years, and is the chief basis of that love of independence and impatience of tyranny found only among manful and continent nations.—Prof. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

THOUGH I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood;
Nor did not with unbashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility:
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly.—Shakspere.

IF a building is unsafe, it may be torn down before the plans of the new edifice are wholly completed. If a beacon is false, let it be removed, even before the true light-house can be built. If a belief that God wrote the Bible is untrue, and is moreover debasing to the intellect, let it be overthrown. If it is false that God of his own free will has elected some to everlasting life, and left the vast multitude of his creatures to suffer endless torment in hell, and if these ideas are injurious to both mind and heart, destroy them! The sooner the better. The abolition of slavery was opposed by good and wise men, because freedom would lead to license. Did this idea stop the antislavery party? The event proved the truth of the objection. The ignorant negro became the prey of the politicians who wanted his vote; and, trusting in their promis that the government would giv to each man forty acres of land and a mule, he abandoned himself to the license of laziness, which he considered the essence of "freedery," until the inexorable logic of hunger and suffering taught him that true freedom was liberty to work and do right. He soon learned the lesson; and the doubled production of the South and its good order now prove that freedom is not a curse.—Robt. C. Adams.

NEW ideas come into this world somewhat like falling meteors, with a flash and an explosion, and perhaps somebody's castle-roof perforated. To try to polish the stone in its descent, to giv it a peculiar turn, and make it whistle a tune, perchance, would be of no use, if it were possible. Your polish stuff turns out not to be meteoric but of this earth. However, there is plenty of time, and nature is an admirable schoolmistress.—Thoreau.

FORCE is no impelling God, no entity separate from the material substratum; it is inseparable from matter, is one of its eternal indwelling properties. A force unconnected with matter, hovering loose over matter, is an utterly empty conception. In nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, oxgen, in sulphur and phosphorus, their several properties hav dwelt from all eternity.—Moleschott.

FUNDAMENTALLY, as is readily seen, there exists neither force nor matter. Both are abstractions of things, such as they are, looked at from different standpoints. They complete and presuppose each other. Isolated they are meaningless. Matter is not a go-cart, to and from which force, like a horse, can be now harnessed, now loosed. A particle of iron is and remains exactly the same thing, whether it shoot through space as a meteoric stone, dash along on the tire of an engin-wheel, or roll in a blood-corpuscle through the veins of a poet. Its properties are eternal, unchangeable, untransferable.—Dubois-Reymond.

NOTHING in the world authorizes us to suppose the existence of forces in and by themselvs, without bodies, from which they can go out and on which they work.—Cotta.

As we can think of no force without a material substratum, so we know of no matter which is not connected with a number of forces.—F. Mohr.

FORCE without matter is not a reality, and both by their union hav made the world and all its phenomena. Without matter no force, without force no phenomenon, also without matter no phenomenon.—Ph. Spiller.

WE know of no matter which does not possess force, and on the other hand we know of no forces which are not joined to matter.—Haeckel.

To regard matter as passiv, and to suppose a force working on it from without, is so grave an error that it would not be possible to fall into it if inborn and mystical fancies did not cloud the mind. Matter and force, like form and matter, are no separable entities, but different conditions of one and the same thing.—F. Vignoli.

WE must hold firmly to the principle that matter and force are indivisibly joined together, so that force without matter has no independent existence.—S. Cornelius.

IT is apparent that all attempts to isolate forces from matter, and vice versa, are only one-sided abstractions, depending on the notion that force and matter may be found in nature as distinct entities, because in speech they are distinct words.—Weis.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 17. No. 32. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, August 9, 1890. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE American Federation of Labor has, through its president, issued invitations to an international labor congress, to be held in Chicago in the year 1893.

THE proprietors of three newspapers published on the island of Malta hav been excommunicated for printing articles against the pope and the bishop of Malta.

THE Orleans, N. Y., Herald remarks that those "who want religion in the public schools seem to be more anxious to introduce their own theology than to introduce good morals."

THE pope has authorized the drawings for his own sarcophagus for the Church of St. Giovanni, to be erected three years after his death. It will be of Italian porphyry, and cost $25,000.

THE growth of the German universities is well illustrated by the fact that within the last forty years the number of professorships at the Prussia universities has increased fifty-three per cent.

IF governments derive their powers not from the people but from God, as the National Reformers assert, how comes it that the people can and do reform governments? How is it that they can and do take from governments powers which they formerly held?—American Sentinel.

AN Edinburgh millionaire has conveyed £84,459 sterling—nearly half a million dollars—to trustees, himself being one, to advance the cause at home and abroad of total abstinence from liquor, tobacco, and opium, and for "disseminating a knowledge of the anti-scriptural character of the church of Rome."

IN Massachusetts an attempt to assault a four-year-old child was made a short while ago. The criminal went free, because the only witness to the dastardly act was the assaulted child herself, whose testimony was not taken as valid, for the reason that she had no conception of the sacredness of an oath.

OF the priests of the Catholic church in this country, numbering in all 8,332, 2,217 or about one-fourth, according to a recent report, are members of religious orders. Of this number 637 are Jesuits, 323 Benedictines, 231 Franciscans, 193 Redemptorists, 96 Dominicans, 82 Capuchins, the remainder being divided among nineteen other religious orders.

BISMARCK said in a late interview that he differed with the emperor on the question of Socialism. The emperor had decided to try to induce the Socialists to maintain a peaceful attitude by means of concessions, but he (Bismarck) believed in fighting them as blackmailers. The sooner they were defied the better. The time would come, he said, when Socialism would be found to be a military question, and in place of the present mild state of siege there would be a universal state of war.

THE Christian Guide, published in Boston, by Rev. J. B. Daly, a converted priest, says: "Bishop Doane, in an article on the school question, remarks that 'separate schools for Protestants and Romanists are allowed in England and Holland.' Well, that is a very good reason why we do not want separate schools in the United States. Separate schools would necessarily be religious; and the United States could not support such schools, for the most prominent feature of our government is the separation of church and state."

THE Pall Mall Gazette, referring to the revival of the proposal to erect a monument to Heine, the eminent Freethinking poet, in Dusseldorf, his nativ town, says: "When the project was first started some two or three years ago it was opposed by the orthodox party of the district with all the religious intolerance of which that part of the Rhine province is capable. At a meeting which was held a few days ago at the house of an eminent lawyer at Dusseldorf, letters were read from some of the most eminent authors, poets, and all parts of Germany, advocating the erection of such a monument. The emperor himself, orthodox though he is in his religious views, is altogether in favor of the monument, and it is to be hoped that this time the narrowness of the Dusseldorfer will not prevent the erection of the monument."

THE idea of applying the name "corporation" to what is commonly called a church, in the case of the Roman and the Mormon institutions, is a particularly happy one, as well as true in every particular. Did it ever occur to anyone in whom all the rich properties of the corporation in this city are vested? The archbishop forms a corporation of one to hold them. They are not the property of the laity, who pay for them, but of the poor (?) priest. We often hear complaints against the assessors for favoring this or that corporation by letting it off with a lighter taxation than it should, but the Roman corporation gets off scot-free. Is not this a favored body corporate? To boldly declaim against the injustice of this is, forsooth, bigotry and intolerance, but it will be found on a calm, dispassionate investigation that such favors to this corporation are the result of bigotry and intolerance to the rest of society.—Chicago Loyal American.

THE situation of affairs touching the World's Fair at Chicago is profoundly discouraging to those who desire—as all Americans must—that nothing shall stand in the way of the complete success of an enterprise involving the honor of the country. There is a quarrel, having three or more sides to it, over the question of site; there is a political wrangle between the city authorities and the fair managers and the politicians opposed to the city authorities; there is grave doubt as to financial possibilities; railroad interests and property owners' interests and speculators' interests interfere embarrassingly at every point; the Sunday question has been raised, and now the legislativ special session called to provide for the fair is threatened with invasion by all the antagonistic forces. Meanwhile the board of agriculture has become dissatisfied, and threatens to withdraw agricultural support entirely if its wishes are not gratified in the matter of site.

HAD the dreadful disaster which befell on Lake Pepin a week ago Sunday happened a generation earlier, what warnings would hav come from pulpit and press on the consequences of breaking the Sabbath! It would hav been a clear case in which God had unmistakably stricken in his wrath the wicked people who had presumed to break his holy law. We hav not as yet an opportunity to see, but we doubt if we shall be permitted to see a single instance in which the dreadful event will be turned into a warning. The change in this regard that has come over the public mind is so widespread and deep that the smallest of sectarian zealots are compelled to abate the zeal that never was according to knowledge. Once the plague, cholera, and even minor forms of pestilence were regarded as tokens of God's wrath upon a sinful world. Now they are seen to hav their occasions in climatic and sanitary conditions in which human sinfulness is hardly so much a factor.—Christian Leader.

OPPONENTS of the federal election bill impute various motivs to its promoters, according to the opponents' own views and opinions. The particular view taken by the official organ of the Farmers' Alliance is this: "Just what effect the federal election bill that recently passed the House will hav, or to what extent it will reopen sectional hostilities, is difficult to determin at this time. The source from which this bill emanated—New England—is positiv proof that it is intended to provoke disturbances, breed riots, and prepare the way for further acts of repression. If this scheme is successful, sectionalism, with all that term implies, will again curse the people of the South and West, and the East will, as usual, fatten and thrive in consequence. It is to be hoped that the organized wealth producers of either section will resist all such efforts, and refuse to be made a tool by monopoly and greed to the extent of again falling into a pit prepared expressly for them by the wily politicians and money owners."

No other country on the globe is so determined an advocate of compulsory common-school education as is Prussia. The government there has recently promulgated a new school law which will go into force the first of October of this year. Each and every child is compelled by the law to attend the public schools from the completion of his sixth to the completion of his fourteenth year, and this is not for a few consecutiv weeks or months, but for the whole year. By agreement between parents and school authorities, entrance and departure from the schools may take place a few months earlier or later than the legal age. Unless excused for good reasons, satisfactory to the local authorities, the absence of one day is punished by a fine of from ten pfennigs (2½ cents) to 1 mark (24 cents), or by imprisonment of the parents from 3 to 24 hours. In certain cases the parents can be compelled to work out this fine. Employers who permit children to work for them during school hours are fined as high as 100 marks or are imprisoned 14 days.

THE ministry of public education of Russia has issued new rules and regulations for the conduct of free public libraries, established by churches, communities, literary societies, or private citizens. Among them are the following: Every such library must stand under the direct supervision of a committee appointed by the civil, religious, and educational authorities of the place. A catalog of books and periodicals allowed to be circulated in such libraries will be issued annually by a commission appointed by the ministry of popular education and the holy synod. The local committee shall hav the power to close the library and to confiscate the books as soon as they discover any departure from the new rules. No book of a religious tendency beside that of the "Orthodox church," and no book on history, social philosophy, or descriptiv foreign life, save those that are approved of by both the general and the religious censors, should be contained in the catalogs of the free public libraries. The managers of a library desiring to purchase new books must make out a list of those books and present it for approval to the local committee, and, having obtained their approval, the list must be submitted to the highest government official of the place, without whose sanction the purchase cannot be made.—Sun.

"I DO not go to the extent of some scientists," said a distinguished student of the animal kingdom recently, "in the opinion that a time will ever come when the lower animals will possess the power of speech, but I firmly believe that in a few generations certain of these animals will advance to a wonderful degree in the matter of intelligence. Experiments hav been already made in England which demonstrate that some of them are capable of almost everything except the power to speak. Shepherd dogs hav been taught to count, and, at the order of their master, will bring back a certain number of sheep from the pasture, if credence is to be placed in the reports which hav been made from time to time within the last few years, and which bear the stamp of authenticity. In order that the education of animals—like cats, dogs, and horses, which hav already shown a certain degree of mentality—may be brought to the highest state of perfection it is necessary that the more intelligent of those brutes should be kept apart from others of their kind, and should be interbred, while their offspring should be treated in the same way. A horse-trainer of national renown told me not long ago that he had been working on that theory for many years, and that he found the offspring of trick horses were much more easily taught than those which came from animals never trained in the ring."

IN the earlier times the virtues of the church were brought into actual and practical use. In the days when the church authorized and traded in mystic devices a rusty medal demolished the measles, a mysterious-looking piece of old parchment banished pain; a mysterious maneuver of the hand so terrified a full-grown tumor that it immediately disappeared, and not infrequently would a pocketful of dirt from authoritativ quarters occasion considerable annoyance to his satanic majesty. The following are specimens of an art which flourished in the early history of the church, and which is unfortunately not entirely extinct in our enlightened day. The amulet represented an early and approved device for containing distinct virtues; in addition there were numerous forms and kinds of receptacles for bottled virtue. Even small quantities of bread which had been consecrated in the sacrament of the eucharist were worn by the living and buried with the dead as a defense against evil spirits; dirt and dust from the holy land always commanded a stiff price in the market, being an infallible panacea against certain evils; crosses, passages of scripture, relics of the martyrs, images of the saints, and a multitude of other things were worn by the people as preventivs against disease, danger, and witchcraft. There were special charms for certain diseases and accidents, from being wounded in battle and for arresting hemorrhages.—Pittsburgh Press.

CIVILIZED Europe is shocked at the receipt of the full details of the new Russian persecution of the Jews. The Russian edicts are of the most cruel character. The first edict says: "No Jew is any longer permitted to own or even farm land." All Jewish landowners, farmers, and agricultural laborers are thus expelled from their village homes. Unless they hav saved means enough for their sustenance they will be reduced to beggary. To intensify the severity of this edict, the government officers hav included hundreds of small towns in the category of country villages, and expelled Jews from them by tens of thousands, who will thus be rendered homeless. These laws, known as the May laws, were promulgated in 1882, but never enforced until now. The second edict provides that all Jews, numbering many thousand families, settled outside the sixteen specified counties shall be expelled. An equally large number of the artisan class will be rendered homeless by the enforcement. The third edict withdraws permission for them to reside outside these sixteen counties. All Jews are precluded by the fourth edict from holding mining shares or connecting themselvs in any way with the mining industry, and the fifth still further restricts their participating in the educational advantages. The sixth edict imposes upon the Jewish students another disability by closing the legal profession against them, while the seventh edict excludes them from the engineering, naval, and medical professions and from all government offices. The cruel part of these prohibitions is that an enormous proportion of the Jewish population are skilled agriculturists, artisans, and professional men, who were all adding largely to the wealth of the empire. All these will now be ruined. It is estimated that nearly a million people will be expelled from their homes under these most tyrannical and reactionary new laws. Only one object can be contemplated by the instigators of the persecution, namely, the total extermination of the four million Jews in Russia. The Holy Orthodox church of that land is determined that no dissenters shall continue where they present to her flocks a living contradiction of her doctrins.

The French Revolution: Its Causes and Influences.

This great Gallic revolt of the eighteenth century must possess a charming interest to the lover of civil and mental liberty. In it the two greatest curses of humanity, kingcraft and priestcraft, received their deathblow. The evils and corruptions of centuries were revenged in one terrible conflict which drenched Europe in blood, and which pulled down and built up kingdoms. It obliterated the last vestiges of the Middle Ages. Now for the last time did an emperor wear upon his head the crown of the Cæsars, and never since the days of Charlemagne was Europe so completely under the sway of one man's power.

The world is beginning to see that such national outbreaks are not the result of the new ideas or fanatical enthusiasm of the age in which they reach their culminating point. Philosophy and reason teach us that such insurrections hav their causes deeply imbedded in the centuries of national history. Like the causes of the late civil war in our own country, the causes of the French Revolution date back into the earliest history of the country. Through the years that intervened the blue sky of peace was darkened, and suddenly the cloud of accumulated tyranny and corruption burst with a clap of thunder, destroying much it is true, but as the winter gale scatters the withered leaves of autumn upon the ground, preparing the tree for the blossoming buds of spring-time. For two centuries the wealth and prosperity of the French nation, like the great rock of Niagara Falls, had been slowly, but terribly worn away by the flood of profligacy and corruption that characterized its rulers, both spiritual and temporal. The magnificent achievements of Richelieu and Colbert, the two ministers who were the glories of the ages in which they lived, were not emulated by their successors. The French people did not "add by their own toil to the acquisitions of their ancestors," and national degeneracy was the result.

In the ages just preceding the great event of which we are speaking there were three distinct classes of people in France—the clergy, the nobility, and the commons. The customs of the middle ages, which lingered so long in France, made the latter class dependent upon the two former. Mediæval influences did not gradually subside, and civil liberty grow from their ruins, as was the case in England. Buckle says this was because the French people looked upon their government with a superstitious reverence, and always forbore to assail it, however corrupt or tyrannical. Thus, as the same great author says, France did not follow the example of other nations, who preserved an equilibrium by reforming their government as they diminished their superstition.

It was the duty of the king to tell the people what to do, and of the priest to tell them what to believe, and of the people to submit to both without a murmur.

One-fifth of all the lands belonged to the king, one-fifth to the clergy, and one-fifth to the nobility. Thus three-fifths of the real estate of the kingdom, and that by far the most valuable, was in possession of the privileged classes.

Not only were the people almost wholly exempt from land-holding, but they were compelled to pay the taxes upon the property of the clergy and nobility, who paid no tax whatever. Here is a lesson for our own country at the present day: The practice of exempting from just taxation the property of a favored few, either political or religious, then allowing them to accumulate wealth at the expense of the community at large, will at one day end in disaster to the nation. Those on whom the load is piled will groan under the burden and throw it upon the ground. The brawny sons of toil, already oppressed by heavy taxation, will refuse to support a million-dollar cathedral dedicated to the service of superstition, and a class of idlers and deadheads. Let our legislators who are afraid to denounce this growing evil for fear of offending Mother Grundy, whose influence alone supports the monstrous monopoly, look back upon the sunny fields of France and profit by her experience.

These privileged classes plunged the country into useless wars, which ran the government deeply in debt, thus increasing the rate of taxation. Money was not only required for war, but the government strutted in almost oriental magnificence, and this, too, came from the hard earnings of the people. The nation was becoming poorer and poorer, and its rulers corrupter than ever. The deluge, predicted by Louis XIV., seemed near at hand.

We hav, however, been looking at but one side of the picture. We hav but noticed the imbecility and corruption into which the state of France had sunk. Strange to say, at this time the intellect began to exert itself as never before. A school of philosophers arose, who began to question the very foundation upon which society and government were founded, and to investigate the claims upon which the church and state held the masses in bondage.

At the head of these stood the great philosopher and grand intellectual monument of the eighteenth century—Voltaire. Next to him stood D'Alembert and Diderot. Among the others was Rousseau, Turgot, and Helvetius. These great thinkers had their thoughts published together in a work of thirty-seven volumes, called the "Encyclopedie Francaise."

This work may well be called the text-book of the conflict, as it pointed out the grievances under which the people were bending, arousing them to demand a new order of things. In it priestcraft and kingcraft saw their doom, and both did all they could to suppress it, but to no avail. The masses could no longer be soothed by royal flattery or priestly hypocrisy. They were now conscious of their wrongs, and nothing could direct their attention to anything else. Another powerful influence at work on the French mind was the American revolution. The presence of Benjamin Franklin at the court of Versailles created the greatest enthusiasm for the cause of liberty.

This enthusiasm soon found a cause for demonstration. One evening Franklin and Voltaire went together to the theater, and after the play was over they were called upon the stage. The audience, with heartfelt gratitude for the good these two great men had accomplished for humanity, when they saw the sages of the Old World and the New embrace each other, shouted from the top of their voices, "Solon and Socrates." The great Voltaire died shortly after this, little thinking of the mighty conflict that was soon to thunder above his grave.

The cloud that had been gathering for centuries was becoming denser and denser. The crops had failed and the starving multitude were raving for bread. The nation was drowned in debt. The extravagances of ages had made it insolvent. King Louis XVI., while he was of a kind and generous disposition, was weak and effeminate, and with little power of resolution, both of which qualities were greatly needed in such a crisis. Not knowing what to do, he called together the house of deputies, or French parliament, to see what action they would take. This assembly consisted of three orders, representing the three classes of people—the commons, consisting of the representativs of the people; the clergy, composed of the dignitaries of the church; and the nobles, representing the aristocracy of the kingdom. The principal reason for calling these men together was to consider the finances of the kingdom, which were now in their worst condition.

On the second day of the session the first disagreement began. The nobles and clergy saw that they stood no chance in the house of deputies, as the commons then outnumbered them two to one, and could thus defeat any of their plans.

Thereupon the two privileged orders retired to an opposit chamber. Negotiations between the two parties began, and were continued for five weeks, but no conclusion could be reached. The commons then declared themselvs the only legal assembly in France. They all took an oath not to adjourn until they had adopted a constitution for their oppressed country.

The king, amazed at this, sent a messenger, who ordered them to disperse, when Mirabeau, their president, called the "Shakspere of oratory," dashed to his feet, his large dark eyes flashing as lightning, and in a voice of thunder said to the embassador, "Yes, monsieur, we hav heard what the king has advised you to say, but you can not be the interpreter of his orders to the states-general. You hav neither place or right of speech here. You are not the man to remind us of it. Go, slave, and tell those who sent you that we are here by the will of the people, and that nothing but bayonets can drive us hence."

All Europe was paralyzed by these words. For the first time the authority of the crown was openly defied, and the representativs of the people in control of the government, daring all opposition. The king, persuaded by the nobles and clergy, orders troops in the vicinity of Versailles. These forces were composed chiefly of Swiss and German mercenaries, who had no sympathy with the popular opinions. The thought of these foreign hirelings being brought in to cut down the liberties of the people, instead of intimidating them only enraged them the more. Finally, at a large gathering of the people in one of the parks of the city, Camille Desmoulins jumped on one of the wine tables, and cried out, "Citizens! there is not a moment to lose; the removal of Neckar is a tocsin for a St. Bartholomew of the patriots. This evening all the Swiss and German guards are coming out of the Camp-de-Mars to slaughter us. There remains for us but one recourse; let us rush to arms!" The cloud had broken. Tyrants all over the world trembled for their thrones. This was especially true in England, where the progress of liberty was swiftly advancing. Laws against the freedom of the press and the liberty of speech were rigidly enforced. Edmund Burke, being a pensioner, and knowing that the downfall of royalty would end in his own downfall, wrote a pamphlet denouncing the French Revolution in all its bearings. Thomas Paine replied to him in one of his greatest works, "The Rights of Man." Paine had well said, "Where there is no liberty, there is my country."

His reply to Burke is one of the grandest appeals ever made by man for his fellow-men in distress. Yet for writing it, he was banished from England and compelled to flee to France. In this country its influence was keenly felt. The Republican party, with Thomas Jefferson at its head, remembering the aid given by the warm-hearted Frenchman during our own great struggle for liberty, expressed warm sympathy with their French brethren, while the conservativ, or federal party, thought the United States ought to take no part in foreign affairs. Much bitterness of feeling existed between the parties because of this difference.

Let us pause and observe the effect this conflict had upon the world. All the abuses mentioned in the former part of this paper were obliterated. Von Sybel, in his "History of the French Revolution," says: "Serfdom, feudal jurisdiction, manorial ground rents, tithes, game laws, saleable offices, clerical fees, robing dues, municipal and provincial privileges of rank, exemption from taxes, plurality of offices and livings, were all swept away in one night. Many things the assembly did that one night which were of little moment, but there were advantages gained that night which were eternal—freedom of labor, equality before the law, and the unity of the state."

The terrible excesses to which the French Revolution was carried hav attracted the attention of all who hav written upon the subject. Charles Watts, the Secular Cicero, has given three reasons for these, in his excellent pamphlet, "The Horrors of the French Revolution: Their Causes." "1. The persistent alliance of the church and priestcraft with the political and social corruptions of the time. 2. The fever of despair into which the crown, the aristocracy, and the clergy had driven the people. 3. The interference of the allied European powers in the internal affairs of the French people by a threatened uncalled for and remorseless invasion of their territory."

Alison says: "France would hav done less at the Revolution had she done more before it. She would not so mercilessly hav wielded the sword to govern, if she had not so long been governed by the sword; nor could she hav sunk for years under the guillotin of the populace had she not groaned for centuries under the fetters of the nobility."

In the same strain Thomas Carlyle speaks: "Fancy, then, some five full-grown millions of such quaint figures, with haggard faces and woolen jupes, with copper-studded leather girths and thigh sabots, starting up to ask their whitewashed upper classes virtually this question: How hav ye treated us? How hav ye taught us, fed us, and led us while we toiled for you? The answer can be read in the flames over the nightly skies. This is the feeding we had of you—emptiness of pocket, of stomach, of head, of heart. Behold, there is nothing in us—nothing but what nature givs her wild children of the desert—ferocity of appetite, strength grounded on hunger. Did you mark among the rights of men that man was not to die of starvation while there was bread reaped by him? It is among the mights of men."

We know that revolutions sometimes bring as many evils as they take away, but they are the only cure for centuries of misgovernment. The evils they bring last only for a time, but the evils they obliterate and the reforms they leave are, as one historian has said, eternal.

Immortal or Not?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As the subject of personal immortality is still up in your hospitable columns, and is not likely soon to be downed by anybody's bidding, will you please allow room for a little of Thoreau's thought upon it?

The occasion was as follows: The brig St. John, laden with emigrants from Galway, Ireland, was wrecked off Cohasset, Mass., Sunday, Oct. 7, 1849. Mr. Thoreau left Concord for Cape Cod the next Tuesday, and hearing at Boston of the catastrophe, concluded to go by the way of Cohasset. The following are some of his reflections:

Why care for these dead bodies? They really hav no friends but the worms and fishes. Their owners were coming to the new world as Columbus and the Pilgrims did. They were within a mile of its shores, but before they could reach them they emigrated to a newer world than ever Columbus dreamed of, yet one of whose existence there is far more universal and convincing evidence—though it has not yet been discovered by science—than Columbus had of this; not merely mariner's tales and some paltry drift-wood and sea-weed, but a continual drift and instinct to all our shores. I saw their empty hulks that came to land; but they themselvs, meanwhile, were cast upon some shore yet farther west, toward which we are all tending, and which we shall reach at last, it may be through storm and darkness as they did. No doubt we [they?] hav reason to thank God that they hav not been shipwrecked into life again.

The mariner who makes the safest port in heaven, perchance, seems to his friends on earth to be shipwrecked, for they deem Boston harbor the better place; though, perhaps, invisible to them, a skilful pilot comes to meet him, and the fairest and balmiest gales blow off that coast, while his good ship makes the land in halcyon days, and he kisses the shore in rapture there while his old hulk tosses in the surf here.

It is hard to part with one's body, but no doubt it is easy enough to do without it when once it is gone. All their plans and hopes burst like a bubble. Infants by the score dashed upon the rocks by the enraged Atlantic. No, no! If the St. John did not make her port here, she has been telegraphed there. The strongest wind cannot stagger a spirit. It is a spirit's breath. A just man's purpose cannot be split on any grampus or material rock, but itself will split rocks till it succeeds.

Satan.

The eminent Italian poet Carducci is the subject of an article in Harper's Magazine, which contains a translation of the poet's "Hymn to Satan," the issue of which infuriated the orthodox. This stirring poem, in which Satan is to be understood as typifying the natural energies of affection and reason which are antagonistic to the Christian asceticism and unreason, we here reproduce:

To thee my verses,
Unbridled and daring,
Shall mount, O Satan,
King of the banquet.

Away with thy sprinkling,
O priest, and thy droning,
For never shall Satan,
O priest, stand behind thee.

See how the rust is Gnawing the mystical
Sword of St. Michael;
And how the faithful

Wind plucked archangel
Falls into emptiness!
Frozen the thunder in Hand of Jehovah.

Like to pale meteors, or Planets exhausted,
Out of the firmament
Rain down the angels.

Here in the matter
Which never sleeps,
King of phenomena,
King of all forms,

Thou, Satan, livest!
Thine is the empire
Felt in the dark eyes'
Tremulous flashing,

Whether their languishing
Glances resist, or,
Glittering and tearful, they Call and invite.

How shine the clusters
With happy blood,
So that the furious
Joy may not perish!

So that the languishing
Love be restored,
And sorrow be banished
And love be increased!

Thy breath, O Satan!
My verses inspires
When from my bosom
The gods I defy

Of kings pontifical,
Of kings inhuman:
Thine is the lightning that Sets minds to shaking.

For thee Arimanne,
Adonis, Astarte;
For thee lived the marbles
The pictures, the parchments,

When the fair Venus
Anaidomene
Blessed the Ionian
Heavens serene.

For thee were roaring the Forests of Lebanon,
Of the fair Cyprian
Lover reborn;

For thee rose the chorus,
For thee raved the dances,
For thee the pure-shining
Loves of the virgins,

Under the sweet-odored
Palms of Idume,
Where break in white foam
The Cyprian waves.

What if the barbarous
Nazarene fury,
Fed by the base rites
Of secret feastings,

Lights sacred torches
To burn down the temples,
Scattering abroad the Scrolls hieroglyphic?

In thee find refuge
The humble-roofed plebs,
Who hav not forgotten
The gods of their household.

Thence comes the power,
Fervid and loving, that,
Filling the quick-throbbing
Bosom of woman,

Turns to the succor
Of Nature enfeebled,
A sorceress pallid,
With endless care laden.

Thou to the trance-holden
Eye of the alchemist,
Thou to the view of the Bigoted mago,

Showest the lightning-flash
Of the new time
Shining behind the dark
Bars of the cloister.

Seeking to fly from thee
Here in the world-life
Hides him the gloomy monk
In Theban deserts.

Oh, soul that wanderest
Far from the straight way,
Satan is merciful.
See Héloïsa,

In vain you wear yourself
Thin in rough gown; I
Still murmur the verses
Of Maro and Flaccus

Amid the Davidic
Psalming and wailing;
And—Delphic figures
Close to thy side—

Rosy, amid the dark
Cowls of the friars,
Enters Licorida,
Enters Glicera.

Then other images
Of days more fair
Come to dwell with thee
In thy secret cell.

Lo! from the pages of
Livy, the tribunes
All ardent, the consuls,
The crowds tumultuous,

Awake; and the fantastic
Pride of Italian
Drives thee, O monk,
Up to the capitol;

And you, whom the flaming
Pyre never melted.
Conjuring voices,
Wiclif and Huss,

Send to the broad breeze
The cry of the watchman:
"The age renews itself;
Full is the time!"

Already tremble
The miters and crowns.
Forth from the cloister
Moves the rebellion.

Under his stole, see,
Fighting and preaching,
Brother Girolamo
Savonarola.

Off goes the tunic
Of Martin Luther;
Off go the fetters
That bound human thought.

It flashes and lightens,
Girdled with flame.
Matter, exalt thyself!
Satan has won!

A fair and terrible
Monster unchained
Courses the oceans,
Courses the earth;

Flashing and smoking,
Like the volcanoes, he
Climbs over mountains,
Ravages plains,

Skims the abysses;
Then he is lost
In unknown caverns
And ways profound.

Till lo! unconquered,
From shore to shore,
Like to the whirlwind
He sends forth his cry.

Like to the whirlwind
Spreading his wings
He passes, O people,
Satan the great!

Hail to thee, Satan!
Hail, the Rebellion!
Hail, of the reason the Great Vindicator!

Sacred to thee shall rise
Incense and vows!
Thou hast the God
Of the priests disenthroned!

Bibles, Ancient and Modern.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The Bible is always quoted by the clergy as having been a power in the elevation of woman. Is this so? After much reading of it I am forced to take an opposit view. I hav been surprised and astonished in numberless places in the "good" book by its seeming low estimate and unfair treatment of the female character. In order to show it more clearly, I shall place in two columns, side by side, the seventh chapter of Proverbs, and then the reverse picture painted by myself. Now, I do not pretend to the wisdom of Solomon, but I do claim in this imitation a more truthful picture of human life than is given by the Jewish king.

PROVERBS, CHAPTER VII.

1. My son, keep my words, lay up my commandments with thee.

2. Keep my commandments, and liv; and my law as the apple of thine eye.

3. Bind them upon thy fingers. write them upon the table of thine heart.

4. Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy kinswoman.

5. That they may keep thee from the strange woman, from the stranger which flattereth with her words.

6. For at the window of my house I looked through my casement,

7. And behold among the simple ones, I discerned among the youths a young man void of understanding.

8. Passing through the street near her corner; and he went the way to her house,

9. In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night:

10. And, behold, there met him a woman with the attire of a harlot, and subtle of heart.

11. (She is loud and stubborn; her feet abide not in her house:

12. Now she is without, now in the streets, and lieth at every corner.)

13. So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him,

14. I hav peace offerings with me; this day hav I paid my vows.

15. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face, and I hav found thee.

16. I hav decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt.

17. I hav perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.

18. Come let us take our fill of love until the morning; let us solace ourselvs with loves.

19. For the goodman is not at home, he is gone a long journey:

20. He hath taken a bag of money with him and will come home at the day appointed.

21. With her much fair speech she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips she forced him.

22. He goeth after her straightway as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks;

23. Till a dart strike through his liver as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life.

24 Hearken unto me now therefore, O ye children, and attend to the words of my mouth.

25. Let not thine heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths.

26. For she hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men hav been slain by her.

27. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

IMITATION.

1. My daughter, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee.

2. Keep my commands, and liv; and my law as the apple of thine eye.

3. Regard them as the salvation of thy soul, write them on the tablet of thy heart.

4. Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy mother.

5. That they may keep thee from the adulterous man, and from the lecher which flattereth with his words.

6. For at the side of my house I looked through the curtained window,

7. And behold among the simple ones, I discerned a young woman void of understanding.

8. Passing through the street near his corner; and on her way he enticed her to his house.

9. In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night.

10. And behold there met her a man dressed in gaudy attire, and black of heart.

11. He is froward and enticing, his feet make many steps to catch the simple and undefiled.

12. Now is he without, now in the street, and lieth in wait at every corner, that with his much fair speech he may cause her to yield.

13. So he caught her and frowardly kissed her, and with devilish impudence said unto her,

14. This day will I make my spoken words true; this day will I pay my vows.

15. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face, and I hav found thee.

16. A lie told out of the blackness of his heart, words fitted to apply to any other woman as well.

17. My house is decked with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, carved by the cunning artists of India.

18. My beds are of fine linen redolent with the perfumes of Syria and Lebanon.

19. Come let us take our fill of love until the morning; let us solace ourselvs with loves.

20. For thy father is not at home; thy mother hath gone a long journey, even to the grave, who can say whither?

21. With his much fair speech he caused her to yield, with the flattering of his lips he enticed her.

22. She goeth after him straightway as a bird to the snare of the fowler, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks.

23 Till a dart strike through her liver even as the bird hasteth to the snare and knoweth not it is for its life.

24. Hearken unto me now, therefore, O ye women, and attend to the words of my mouth.

25. Let not thine heart incline to his ways; do not be led astray by walking in his paths.

26. For he hath cast down many virtuous women; yea, many glorious daughters hav been slain by him.

27. His devious paths lead down to hell, his devices overflow the chambers of death.

Liberal John Adams.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I find in the New American Cyclopedia, in the article John Adams, a passage that may be of seasonable interest to most of your readers. Adams was born Oct. 19, 1735, just one century, lacking four months and one day, before the writer of these lines. His father was a deacon of the church, a selectman, and a farmer of limited means, but to agriculture he added the business of shoemaking. John, who was the eldest son, thus obtained means to acquire an education, and was graduated at Harvard College in 1755. His first occupation after graduating was to teach the grammar school in Worcester, Mass. This avocation was so uncongenial to his mind that, in order to gain relief, he began, in addition, the study of the law. He had thought seriously of the clerical profession, but, as he himself expressed it, "the frightful engins of ecclesiastical councils, of diabolical malice and Calvinistic good nature, had terrified him out of it." In short, he took his own measure—the measure of his true manhood—and discovered that he was decidedly too large to occupy the sacred rostrum. I shall not occupy space to recapitulate all the events that culminated in making him the second president of the United States; for my present purpose is to giv as briefly as I can the passage to which I referred, which, it seems to me, especially in view of the time and circumstances, exhibits him as having a decidedly heterodox, not to say skeptical, basis. The cyclopedist says: "Another subject on which he continued to feel a great interest was theology. He had begun an Arminian, and the more he had read and thought, and the older he grew, the freer views he took."

Though clinging with tenacity to the religious institutions of New England, it would seem from his correspondence that he had finally curtailed his theology to the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount. Of his views on this point, he gave evidence in his last public act, to which we now approach. Mrs. Adams had died in 1818, but even that shock, severe as it was, did not unsettle the firm grasp of her husband on life, its enjoyments and its duties. When in consequence of the erection of the district of Maine into a separate state, a convention was to meet in 1820 to revise the constitution of Massachusetts, . . . he was chosen a delegate; and upon his appearance there was received by the members standing, with every demonstration of affection and regard. A series of resolutions was forthwith offered and passed, containing an enumeration and warm acknowledgment of some of his principal public services, and calling upon him to preside. This he declined to do on the score of age and infirmities. The same cause also prevented his taking any very activ part in the proceedings. Yet he labored to produce a modification of the third article of the Bill of Rights, on the subject of public worship, and its support, an article which, when originally drawing the rest of that instrument, he had passed over to other hands. But the time had not yet come for such changes as he wished. The old Puritan feeling was still in too great force to acknowledge the equal rights, political and religious, of others than Christians. Yet, however it might be with his colleagues or his fellow-citizens, Mr. Adams in this movement expressed his own ideas. One of his latest letters, written in 1825, and addressed to Jefferson, is a remarkable protest against the blasphemy laws, so called, of Massachusetts and the rest of the Union, as being utterly inconsistent with the "rights of free inquiry and private judgment."

I hav thus transcribed, almost verbatim, only with a slight departure for brevity, the language of the Cyclopedia; and I particularly offer this to your readers, because a friend of some pretensions to historical learning has claimed that the elder Adams was a sound orthodox Christian, and that he wrote a work against Paine's "Age of Reason" and a series of letters to his sons on "The Bible and its Teachings."

This is true of John Quincy but not of his father. It is true that the elder Adams differed in some of his views on politics from Paine, but I do not think he considered that this patriotic Deist was greatly in error in his religious ideas. As to John Quincy Adams's pious and pueril letters (which hav been published) addressed to his sons on the "Bible and its Teachings," all their merit lies in their piety, and shows plainly a stage in the mental and moral decadence of a once great family. J. K. P. BAKER.

We claim that not only does Rationalism refute the charge that it is solely destructiv, but all valuable construction is secured by its methods. Where Christianity influences intelligent people for good, it is owing to its adoption of Rationalism. Its modified supernaturalism is serviceable to some heathen races as a stepping-stone toward naturalism; but the motiv forces that advance civilization are not prayer, conversion, and religious dogmas, but knowledge of nature and the application of her hitherto secret powers to the welfare of man.—Robt. C. Adams.

The American Secular Union Should be Sustained.

The earnest appeal of President Westbrook published in all the Liberal papers reminded me that I had not sent in my yearly contribution to the Secular Union.

I will embrace this opportunity to say a few words in connection with the general course pursued by that gentleman since he has occupied the position of president of the American Secular Union. Up to the time that he published his views in relation to the line of operations that seemed most opportune for the officers of the Union, there had been a general impression among Freethinkers who had been supporting Freethought literature and Liberal associations that the American Secular Union was a religious organization. That is, it was supposed by many that those who united themselvs with Secular societies, local or general, did it with the object of helping to organize an association which had constructiv principles of a religious character. Such was my impression when I favored the change of the name of the Albany Liberal Association to that of the Albany Secular Society. Our association had always been a sort of debating society, and while the organization existed it continued to be such and nothing more. Notwithstanding that I performed a great deal of labor in trying to make the new movement a success, I found it almost impossible to make any number believe that there was anything religious about the word Secular, although there was religion enough in it for me, taking the philosophical interpretations given to it as an ethical movement by Mr. Holyoake, Mr. Watts, and others. In fact, so far as I am concerned myself, I care not what name be given to a philosophy that is based on reason and knowledge, if it possesses the valuable elements of what is called religion without any of the superstition, debasing hypocrisy, and fiendish selfishness displayed by the various Christian and other so-called religious sects.

But irrespectiv of my own views on the subject, it seems quite out of place for most people—I refer to those I hav come in contact with—to regard the word secular as having any application to the sentiment of religion. In all the affairs of life the word secular is usually interpreted to mean something that, if not opposed to religion, is, at least, entirely unconnected with it. Therefore, when the program of the last Secular congress was published I heartily rejoiced. I thought that it was an excellent stroke of policy on the part of President Westbrook to secure the approval and assistance of popular men who were not connected with us from a religious standpoint.

I believe that the majority of the people of this country, if a fair and intelligent opportunity were given them, would vote for the total separation of church and state in all the departments of government, local and general. But the trouble is that a fair and intelligent opportunity cannot be presented, for many reasons, until this great auxiliary to our cause is put in better working order. It is only through the effectivness of such an organization as the American Secular Union that we can hope to stem and turn back the tide of sectarian aggression and ecclesiastical legislation. J. J. MCCABE.

The Chicago Secular Union.

For some months past two Freethought societies hav had an existence in Chicago—respectivly, the Chicago Secular Union, and the American Secular Union of Chicago. A union of the two has just been effected, the latter society returning its charter and combining with the Chicago Secular Union.

Of this organization Judge C. B. Waite was elected president, John F. Geeting vice-president, Dr. Jos. H. Greer treasurer, and Mrs. M. A. Freeman secretary. The society considers itself fortunate in its selection of president. Judge Waite is a well-known Liberal, the author of the "History of Christianity," a work which has received the most favorable commendation from the press, both in this country and in Europe. Judge Waite was one of the speakers at the congress of the American Secular Union held in Chicago three years ago. He was perfectly competent to treat his subject—"Freethought in Europe"—intelligently, having become personally acquainted while abroad with a number of the most prominent Liberals. He is an able jurist, and under General Grant's administration was appointed judge of Utah. Mrs. C. B. Waite, his gifted wife, is publisher and editor of the Chicago Law Times, and has recently brought out a pamphlet, written by her husband, entitled, "Conspiracy against the Republic," a consideration of the Blair amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. Geeting, the vice-president, is a young lawyer intensely, or rather activly, interested in the secularization of the state. In the combination of the two societies the Nine Demands were adopted as a basis of work, the new society declaring itself an auxiliary to the national organization.

Dr. Greer, the treasurer, is peculiarly fitted for his office. If the society happens to be in arrears the doctor is both perfectly able and willing to supply the deficiency, qualities that are appreciated in a treasurer. The society trusts, however, that under its present management it will not be compelled to impose further upon the doctor's good nature.

Mr. James Abbott, the retiring president of the American Secular Union of Chicago, remains with the society as an activ worker, being one of the board of directors. Mr. Abbott is a man of culture and ability, and has taken a deep interest in the welfare of the society.

Last evening, July 27th, Judge C. B. Waite lectured before the Union on "Church and State." Notwithstanding the warm weather the audience was quite large, many prominent citizens being present. The judge said: The Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law prohibiting free speech, free press, the right of the people to meet in peaceable assembly, and it shall not infringe upon religious liberty. These provisions were in the form of amendments, and without them the Constitution would never hav been adopted. These amendments were made to guard the rights of the states and of the people against the encroachments of federal power. There were ten of these amendments, and they were part of the Constitution itself. The last five amendments have been made to meet the exigencies of the government. The powers of the state government are inherent in the people of the state. Certain limitations hav been placed upon that power. But within these limitations the state is sovereign. It is just as dangerous for the federal government to encroach upon the rights of the state as it would be for the state to usurp the power of the general government. Every amendment to the Constitution is a danger to our form of government. The Blair amendment, proposed in time of profound peace, is a plain encroachment upon the rights of the states. No such emergency exists as gave rise to the amendments following the war.

The Blair amendment is in direct and dangerous antagonism to the original Constitution, which gave Congress no power over the subject of religion or education. The resolution proposing this amendment provides that

> Each state in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years, inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion.

If the principles of the Christian religion could be easily determined the matter would be simplified. Jesus had far less to do in establishing that religion than Paul. Jesus denounced hypocrits. Paul denounced those who differed with him honestly in opinion, declaring in Gal. v, 12: "I would they were even cut off who trouble you."

In a speech in a convention of the National Reform Association, held in New York in Feb., 1873, Rev. Jonathan Edwards, D.D., said:

> We want state and religion and we are going to hav it. It shall be that, so far as the affairs of state require religion, it shall be revealed religion—the religion of Jesus Christ. The Athelst is a dangerous man. Tolerate Atheism, sir! There is nothing out of hell I would not tolerate as soon. Atheism and Christianity are contradictory terms. They are incompatible systems. They cannot dwell together on the same continent.

The spirit here exhibited is the same as that which left its footprints in the Blue laws of several of the American colonies. It is inherited from the Inquisition, and turns for its justification or excuse to the teachings of those who founded the Christian religion. It is no answer to the Blair bill to say that no public money shall be expended in the teaching of the doctrins of any religious sect. It still remains that a combination of sects might declare what should be taught. Nor does it detract from the dangerous character that the author should say that "no state shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

This is mere subterfuge. What more efficacious law respecting an establishment of religion could its votaries desire than an act requiring the principles or doctrins of that religion to be taught at the public expense?

The ecclesiastical power has lost its hold on the reason of man. This attempt to gain control of the Constitution is a desperate effort to bring the aid of the civil power to the support of a lost cause. The attempt should be met with a prompt and merited rebuke.

Let the Constitution remain what our fathers intended it to be, the common heritage of a great, a generous, and a free people.

At the conclusion of Judge Waite's lecture, of which I hav given only the merest outline, a vote of thanks was tendered. On Sunday evening, August 3d, a debate will be held before the society on protection and free trade, and on August 10th a lecture will be given by Moses Hull. MRS. M. A. FREEMAN,

Progress of the Work in Washington.

This being vacation, no further action can be taken in regard to religious worship in public schools till they reopen. But I hav in my possession a letter written by R. B. Bryan, state superintendent of public instruction, sent by him to one he supposed to be very desirous to continue the use of the Bible and the Lord's prayer in the public schools, in which he writes: "The supreme courts of other states where the provisions of the constitution and laws are similar to ours hav decided that religious exercises cannot be conducted in connection with school work, even to the repeating of the Lord's prayer." When the schools reopen we may hav to appeal to the courts so as to definitly settle the question throughout the state.

In regard to our state university I hav already, in the leading daily papers, published a protest of the Washington Secular Union against the resolution of the board of regents "that religious exercises at the university shall be confined to reading the Bible and the repeating of the Lord's prayer." This is palpable and direct violation of the plainest provisions of the constitution. I am preparing a personal letter to each of the regents, giving the law and the facts, and am sanguin that before the time arrives to reopen the university they will be induced to rescind that resolution. Should presentation of facts and arguments fail to induce them to comply with the law we must be prepared to try the effect of mandamus of the courts, and the forfeiture of the $10,000 appropriation of the legislature. There is no shadow of doubt about the final result.

It is admitted that under our state constitution and laws of the legislature, all exemptions from taxation of church property are annulled, but the design of the church fanatics appears to be to obtain delay. They insist on exemption of all church property of less value than $5,000, ignoring the provisions of the constitution, claiming assessments must all be made under the old law this year, in the hope that if the law is thus allowed to lie dormant, interest in the matter will decrease and the law become a dead letter. The Washington Secular Union will dispel such hopes by its vigilant and persistent demands for justice and obedience to the constitution by church folks. Attorney-general Jones has so far failed to reply to my letter, but the Post-Intelligencer, the leading Republican paper of the state, givs this significant item, under date of July 26th: "Governor Ferry has summoned Attorney-general Jones for consultation on important legal business for the state."

The Northern Pacific railroad will hardly pay taxes on its right of way, on the claim of the attorney-general that its exemption from taxation was annulled by the passage of our own state constitution, while the exemption of church, private school, and hospital property is continued despite the constitution.

The willful neglect to assess all property equally, as the law provides, may result in serious difficulty in collecting taxes from any property-owners who hav courage to protest, for it is undeniable that the omission of hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property from the tax lists creates greatly increased burdens, and does gross injustice to honest taxpayers.

I hav again visited the victims of Sunday laws at Tacoma, who were arrested and fined $25 and costs each for selling clothing on Sunday. The cases are appealed to the superior court, and arrangements made that when the case is reached the Washington Secular Union will be represented by able counsel.

Members of the Washington Secular Union are respectivly reminded that six months' dues in advance, July 29th to Jan. 29, 1891—$1—are now due. Please remit the dues, accompanied with such contribution to the defense fund as your interest in the work prompts. C. B. Reynolds,

Sec. Washington Secular Union.

The Assembly of Progress.

Such was the headline of an article in The Truth Seeker recently, from the pen of J. M. Voss, Esq.

Immediately following it was another from C. B. Reynolds, known the world over.

Article one was a description of the new order, its aims and its benefits; while article two was a pen-picturing of the Los Angeles Assembly, with the closing words: "I do not doubt the honesty and good intent of the Los Angeles Assembly of Progress, but their scheme is not practicable or reliable. I hope, however, that it will result in great good, by arousing attention, discussion, and intelligent action on this subject that will eventually giv us a safe, reliable, practicable Liberal mutual aid society."

Now, I am heartily in favor of something on the plan of the above, that is to say, something that will so increase the growth of Liberalism, so band Liberals together, that the most sanguin expectations will hav been surpassed. But I do not think for a moment that that something ought to be separated from, and independent of, the American Secular Union. Far from it. I think it the hight of folly to go seeking for strange gods; in other words, we hav a national organization. It has been in existence for fourteen years. It has made a good fight, and is still bravely withstanding the shocks and storms of cruel priestcraft. Can we afford to desert the old ship? I think not. It is better, far better, if we hav new improvements, to add them to the American Union, thereby increasing its power for humanity and the rights of men. Every time an organization is formed which is separate and distinct from our national order, so much power goes to waste; that is to say, the church is really benefited, and smiles the smile of contentment. We should, one and all, tend to the most substantial and enduring "organization and coöperation." "United we stand, divided we fall," is forcibly applicable. The old motto is true, and being true, should be heeded with patriotic ardor. For my part I think the Assembly of Progress movement premature, and further, that instead of aiding the Liberal cause it will giv it a set-back by crippling its strongest support, viz., the American Secular Union. The place for the matter in question to be settled should be at the next session of the American Secular Union congress. From now on breeze it and talk about it in the papers and among yourselvs, and at the congress finally discuss and settle it. For some time it has been a pet idea with me—it has in fact been with me at my meals, a bed partner, and not absent in the dreams of the night time. I hav thought of the American Secular Union's birth. I hav followed it on through the dreary years. I hav watched with zeal its onward marches until now I can see its standards moving in nearly every state and territory. I realize its influence and position, its greatness for good. I know the strength of its principles, and a roster of intelligent, moral, and judicious members hav acquired the influence it has and the position it holds. And I for one am in favor of making it so great that no opposition or hostility can destroy. Let us, I beseech you, continue the good work so admirably begun until every Liberal is a member, and an auxiliary is organized in every city, village, and hamlet in the United States.

How can this be done? Just as I stated above, by clinging steadfastly to the old ship, by unflinchingly tending to the strongest possible "organization and coöperation." By so doing, when the aid society or such like does come it will be run in connection with the national order and not out in the cold and friendless world alone, wagging with it to keep the fire of life ablaze and not knowing why it wags. Oh, no! Giv me my medicin prepared by the tried and trusted physician, the friend of my boyhood days and after life, and not the drachm mixed by the young and inexperienced drug clerk. To organize an aid society distinct from the American Secular Union is, to my mind, like going back to the days of the bleeders and blisterers, "who," as Ingersoll says, "took a man on the point of a lancet to the verge of eternity and then practiced all their skill to get him back again." I think in connection with every auxiliary throughout the country should be run a "camp," with degree work, religious ceremony of course excluded. Let there be three degrees, similar in name and some respects to those of the Patriotic Order Sons of America—that is, the first to be the Red degree, the second the White degree, and the third the Blue degree, symbolizing the colors in our national flag; the ceremonies to be founded on the history of our land and the principles of our government; and the regalia, a sash of red, white, and blue, studded with stars, like our country's banner. In addition to the social and fraternal benefits conferred each camp will be a beneficiary association, taking care of the sick and distressed members, administering to their necessities, paying sick benefits in case of sickness, and funeral benefits in case of death. There can also be connected with the order, under the management of the national organization, a separate additional life insurance feature, known as the "Liberals' Benefit Fund of the American Secular Union." Membership in the insurance would, of course, be made optional with members.

This is my plan. It has been submitted to the Portsmouth Secular Union, whose members hav agreed to hav it in turn presented to the next session of the American Secular Union congress. It will, in my judgment, greatly improve and strengthen the American Union. It will pave the way to wield a certain and controling hand in shaping the future career of our nation. It will be the means of starting new auxiliaries and with surprising rapidity. And the older ones with the new feature attached will add larger numbers to their roster at each meeting. With the "camp" addition the auxiliaries will lose none of that publicity which is an essential and life principle. They will continue as ever with their public sessions, free to the public, open to all. The "camp" will simply be, I might say, an improvement added to the private business meetings. There are many advantages to be gained by it. For instance, there are two classes of Liberals, those of the Galileo stripe and those of the Bruno kind. These latter form the membership of the American Secular Union; all ought to be members. To make the first-named element available is the question. How will we do it? is asked. My answer is that it is plain to be seen that for many years to come the two kinds will be visible to the experienced eye. That eye also sees, and its possessor is aware, that something ought to be done to please both crowds; that as the Galileo Liberal seems to halt between two opinions in the open, afraid of the church and its boycott in his business, the better plan would be to furnish him a barracks in which to fortify and successfully withstand the arrows of the rabble, and that this barracks shall be the "camp" above described. Another great thing to be derived by the "camp" system would be the burial of our dead. Thereby we would be with our friends, our brothers, through sickness and in death. The church no longer could steal the name of "Infidel" in the last hours and utter hollow words of mockery o'er the tomb. Let us rally for the "camp" or something like it. Let us raise our flag a little higher and make more plain the words upon it: "Equality, Liberty, and Fraternity, the three grandest words in all the languages of men." Will S. Andres.

A Contribution to the History of "Justice" in Sweden.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE SWEDISH NATION.

Translated by Gustave Nelson.

Skäne-Blekinge Hofrätt sentenced me to three months' imprisonment for a lecture delivered in Malmö, "Why am I opposed to Christianity?" His royal majesty sanctioned the judgment, and I was incarcerated in Langholmen as a criminal.

Svea Hofrätt sentenced me to six months' imprisonment for the same lecture, given in Uppskedika city, Hökkufvud county, in Upland. His royal majesty made the sentence three months. The object of the prosecution was to imprison me and restore the stillness of the grave in this superstition-darkened country. Ten thousand honest Swedish men and women became indignant over this conduct of the authorities—treating as a criminal and imprisoning a person who had done nothing but express scientific truths contradicting the superstitious notions of the Christians.

Utilitarians numbering 5,338 forwarded to his royal majesty a protest, in which they declared that they in every particular agreed with me in those opinions for which I was punished, and demanded to one man a similar treatment. And in the name of religious liberty 3,821 Freethinkers urged my liberation.

I suffered brutal and rough treatment. I was twice insulted by the superintendent; likewise by the guard of the prison, no doubt upon order of higher authorities. I became so excited that in the time of April 21st–24th last I was subject to an abnormal state of mind, during which time I saw in the lonely cell small lights and heard sounds, which I then could not explain upon natural grounds. During this intense mental excitement under which I then suffered, those hallucinations to me had objectiv reality, although they were completely subjectiv in character. If I had had the faintest belief in the supernatural I should hav turned from a Saul to a Paul as surely as did the original on his way to Damascus, as I had exactly his experisnce, but the authorities, as soon as they became aware of what had taken place, feared that my reason was at stake and in greatest haste liberated me.

Six months I was confined in prison because I had given expression to my honest opinions—opinions which in fact are shared by the majority of inhabitants of Sweden. The lecture for which I was twice sentenced to three months' imprisonment, had meantime been printed but not confiscated. Three members of the Utilitarian society then took the hazardous step of announcing the pamphlet to the minister of justice and in the name of the law demanding a judicial indictment of it. A jury was impaneled and has now, July 8th, declared that the lecture for which I had suffered was not criminal according to Swedish law. It is the fifth time a jury has declared me not guilty, and it can now safely be asserted that every jury in our land will discharge me. Will the persecution be at an end now, when our authorities hav received such a lesson? We will see when the supreme court sits in judgment upon the two indictments not yet decided, the Norrköping and Linköping indictments, and when I reassume my activity as lecturer.

I hav now explained why for the last two months I hav been so silent. The mental crisis I underwent April 21st–24th and the entirely new experiences I then passed through demanded absolute quiet and mental rest, that I again could be capable of understanding myself. My visit to the island of Dalar—the invigorating breeze from the sea, the mountains and the free nature, together with the company of friends—has restored my nervous equilibrium and given me new strength. And within a short time I hope to be in full activity and shall then in the interest of our cause giv to you the new and strange experiences that I hav passed through during this time.

Where May the Sun Get Its Heat?

From Good Words.

I pointed out that when a shooting-star dashes into our atmosphere its course is attended with an evolution of light and heat owing to its friction through the air. We were thus able to account for the enormous quantity of heat, or what was equivalent to heat, which existed in virtue of the rapid motion of these little bodies. Of course, we only see these meteors at that supreme moment of their dissolution when they dash into our atmosphere. It is, however, impossible to doubt that there must be uncounted shoals of meteors which never collide with our earth. It must necessarily happen that many of the other great globes in our system must, like our globe, absorb multitudes of meteors which they chance to encounter in their roamings. The number of meteors that will be gathered by a globe will be doubtless greater the larger and more massiv the globe, and this for a double reason. In the first place, the dimensions of the net which the globe extends to entrap the meteors will, of course, increase with its size, but in addition the more massiv be the globe the more vehement will be its attraction and the greater will be the number of the meteors that are drawn into its extensiv atmosphere. Of course, this reasoning will apply in a special degree to the sun. We shall probably be correct in the assertion that for every meteor that descends upon this earth at least a million meteors will descend upon the sun. As these objects plow their way through the sun's atmosphere light and heat will be, of course, evolved.

It has been conjectured that the friction of the meteors which are incessantly rushing into the sun may produce light and heat in sufficient quantities to aid in the maintenance of the sun's ordinary expenditure. It has been even supposed that the quantity of energy thus generated may supply all that is wanted to explain the extraordinary circumstance that from age to age no visible decline has taken place in the intensity of the solar radiation. Here again is a question which we must submit to calculation. We hav first of all to determin the heat which could be generated by a body of, let us say, a pound in weight, falling into the sun after having been attracted thither from an indefinitly great distance. The result is not a little startling; it shows us that such a body in the course of its friction through the sun's atmosphere might generate as much heat as could be produced by the combustion of many times its own weight of coal under the most favorable conditions.

The Natural Rights of Man.

That distinguished American poet and philosopher, the venerable Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the Atlantic Monthly for July, in his charming philosophizings, "Over the Teacups," adverts to the question of the prejudice that Christians entertain toward the Hebrews, particularly toward those children of Abraham who dwell in America.

In one place, Dr. Holmes says: "There are two virtues which Christians hav found it very hard to exemplify in practice. These are modesty and civility." Further on he says: "The Jews are with us as a perpetual lesson to teach us modesty and civility. The religion we [Christians] profess is not self-evident. It did not convince the people to whom it was sent. We hav no claim to take it for granted that we are all right and they are all wrong."

In all the persecutions which hav been visited upon the Jews the principle of the natural rights of man has been wantonly violated. The Hebrews hav been insulted, outraged, abased, and ostracised in every country of the civilized world, mainly on account of their differing religious views, customs, and usages. "Christian" persecutors of the "chosen race" seem never to hav realized that the Jews had a natural right to reject the doctrin of the divinity of Jesus and to disbelieve the story of his miraculous conception and birth, and to reject the doctrin of his resurrection and ascension. The outrages and humiliations to which the Jews hav been subjected are no doubt the natural sequel to the hatred and malice engendered in the breasts of dogmatic and contentious Christians, caused by the rejection by the Israelites of the divinity of Jesus, for dogmatic Christians—Catholic or Protestant—are necessarily contending theologians in miniature. The course of the argument against the Jews is thus briefly and effectivly stated by our own Ralph Waldo Emerson: "This was Jehovah come down out of heaven. I will kill you if you say he was a man." Although in most portions of the globe dogmatic and contentious Christians can no longer kill Jews for disagreeing with them upon the subject of religion, despisers of the Semitic race are still engaged in passing sentence of death upon all disbelieving Hebrews, the sentence to be carried out at the expiration of the present life of the recalcitrants.

But what about this great, sublime, and noble doctrin of the natural rights of man? The natural rights of every creature are paramount to ecclesiastical laws and religious doctrins and dogmas. I hav a natural right to air, water, sunshine, food and drink, life and liberty, and an opportunity to attain honorable distinction among the sons of men, whether I be a disciple of Confucius, Zoroaster, Gautama (the Buddha), Socrates, Jesus, or Mohammed; whether I be a worshiper of the planets, of the sun, moon, or stars, or an adorer of images, pictures, or statues; whether I be Agnostic, Atheist, Infidel, Rationalist, Deist, Unitarian, Materialist, Parsee, polytheist, pantheist, or pagan.

I agree with the doctrin of Matthew Arnold, that "conduct is three-fourths of life." A man should be judged by his conduct, and not by his creed. The natural man is amenable to the natural laws of right and justice. The citizen of the world is amenable to those laws which hav the natural rights of man for their basis. The inhabitant of a free state is amenable to those statutes which the people in their sovereign capacity hav adopted and pledged themselvs to uphold.

Every Hebrew has the natural and indefeasible right and privilege to believe as he sees fit, and no person, lay or clerical, has a right to say that the dissenting or assenting child of Abraham ought to be condemned in this world or tortured in the next for any negativ or affirmativ belief which he may entertain. The Jew, the Agnostic, and the Rationalist hav certain natural and inalienable rights which the rest of the world should be compelled to respect. Free man is the glory of God. The rational enjoyments of man must add to the pleasure of the infinit.

Such a political despotism as that of Russia must be abhorrent to the God of reason and rationality. The natural rights of man are not respected in Russia. The will of the czar is the supreme law of the Muscovite empire. Government descends from the czar to the people. In the United States it ascends, theoretically at least, from the people to duly elected and qualified representativs. The theory of government in Russia is that the czar reigns by divine right, that power to rule has been delegated to him by God. The czar is the almighty's deputy or representativ. Practically a republic may resemble a monarchy more nearly than we are apt to think. Thus the United States is not a pure democracy, but a representativ government. We delegate certain powers and concede certain prerogativs to the president of the United States during the space of four years, and delegate certain powers and concede certain prerogativs to senators and representativs in Congress during the spaces of six and two years respectivly. It was a very wise provision which our fathers incorporated in the Constitution when they fixed the term of members of the lower house of Congress at two years. That is long enough for any set of men to be intrusted with legislativ powers. But recent events and tendencies hav shown that the members of the United States Senate should be chosen by a direct vote of the people, instead of the state legislatures. The custom of choosing senators by the legislatures, often contrary to the will of the people, has been fraught with many evils, and approaches too closely the idea of government by an aristocracy or caste. If senators are chosen for six years, they should be elected by a direct vote of the people, by means of the secret ballot. Millionaire senators are not apt to respect the natural rights of the industrial classes. Once chosen to membership in the national senate, and secure in their seats for a period of six years, men of many millions are almost certain to legislate in their own selfish interests and against the interests of the toiling masses. The executiv and legislativ branches of our government exercise great power and enjoy many important privileges and prerogativs. Not being able to vote in person upon proposed laws, owing to the vastness of their population and the wideness of their area, and owing to the expenditure of time and money which such a policy would entail, it is absolutely necessary for the people of the United States and of each state to empower certain representativs and officers to legislate and administer for them. Hence the fact of representativ government in lieu of a democracy pure and simple.

The Supreme Court of the United States, the judges of which are all appointed for life, may declare any law of Congress to be unconstitutional and void. No enactment of Congress or any of the state legislatures is really "the law" until after the Supreme Court of the United States has affirmed the constitutionality thereof. The judges of this august tribunal are endowed by the people with great powers and important prerogativs. The sovereign people hav virtually handed over to the Supreme Court their destinies and their liberties. The judges of the Supreme Court are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. The popular branch of Congress (the House of Representativs) has nothing to do with constituting the personnel of the Supreme Court. The president and the Senate alone determin who shall sit upon the Supreme bench. The Supreme Court of the United States is the most important department of our government. Its decisions affect the welfare and happiness of every citizen who livs in this country. Its interpretation of the law on an appealed case settles the question at issue. From its decrees there is no appeal. Hence the importance of appointing only good men to positions on the Supreme bench, and hence the importance of choosing the Senate, that confirms the judges, by a direct vote of the people. As it is now, the Senators of the United States are elected for six years by the legislatures, and these Senators confirm the appointment of judges who are to hold their offices for life. The power that bestows power upon the judges is too far removed from the people. We hav delegated power to the state legislatures to elect senators, who hav the power to bestow still greater power upon those men whom they confirm as members of the all-important Supreme Court. Our Supreme judges hav the option of continuing to exercise the functions of their office during the term of their natural lives, whereas in England—a constitutional monarchy—the judges hold office "during the king's pleasure." The latter are removable at will. The former are not removable at the president's pleasure.

It behooves the American people to carefully watch for and guard against aggressions of arbitrary power and despotic authority. Unless the people are watchful and vigilant, there will be a practical aristocracy in office-holding established in the United States. We are already too much governed. Ideal government is not force. We are entitled to the largest degree of personal liberty consistent with the maintenance of a strong government.

If we are to hav an aristocracy in this country let it be an aristocracy of brains. Proclaim the fact that men shall administer, legislate, and judge by virtue of their imperial intellects, by virtue of their special fitness to fill certain posts of honor, trust, and responsibility. The mental caliber of statesmen should determin their standing. Many a man has been elevated to the United States Senate, for example, who would never hav been thought of for the place had it not been for his money. The possession of mere money secured for him a seat that should hav been given to some moneyless but capable man. Senators should be chosen by the popular vote.

The natural rights of man are violated every day in this country. A Kansas City paper of a recent date notes a case originating in Chicago. It says: "We hav read nothing from the bench, or rather from those who occupy judicial places, with more satisfaction than the letter of Judge Tuley, of Chicago, to the Personal Rights League. He refers to the case of a citizen arrested and confined for eight days without being allowed to see any friend, on a letter from an 'unknown party.' That such a thing could be in our boasted 'free America' would, abroad, be resented by an American as an insult to his country. Do our people understand the fact that practically there is no personal liberty in this country outside the will of the police? Yet such is the fact. We talk about the common law, but the dominant common law of this country is police law. A man is arrested at will; he is clubbed at the pleasure of the arrester, and he is confined when 'wanted' and as long as 'ordered.'" These are words of truth and candor. They ought to impress us with the importance of standing up for the rights of the individual while we hav the power. The police exercise too much arbitrary authority in this country. The nations of the earth which are ruled by despots (Russia and Turkey for example) hav police whose powers are extraordinary and practically unlimited. We all know what a great pleasure it is to liv in Turkey and Russia, especially Russia. The powers exercised by the police in America actually involve the daily violation of the natural rights of man; it is one of the medieval notions that has crept into our government system. The power of the police must be curtailed No inhabitant of the republic must be illegally arrested, unjustly confined, or unnecessarily annoyed. Personal liberty is too precious to be jeopardized by the police. The state is made for man, not man for the state. This is the American idea. Exalt the thinking individual and you exalt the community of which he is a member. The police powers of the state should be exercised only by Americans, only by persons possessing intelligence, judgment, and discretion, either nativ-born or thoroughly assimilated.

It would not be a great calamity, in any event, for New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, or any other city of the Union, if none but nativ Americans—particularly those who are Americans "from away back"—were to be hereafter appointed as policemen. We must not be oppressed or annoyed by ignorant, brutal, and unthinking persons. "America for Americans" is a cry that has justice, mercy, and truth in it. Given authority, Americans are less liable, as a rule, to violate the principle of the natural rights of man than any other nationality represented under the sheltering wing of our national government. Put none but discreet men on our guard, that the natural and acquired rights of all our people may be protected and duly respected.

Missions and Mission Indians of Upper and Lower California.

Henry W. Henshaw in the August Popular Science Monthly.

Finding that all attempts to colonize the new country [Lower California] were failures, the Mexican government turned it over to the Jesuits, who readily undertook its subjection to ecclesiastical authority. The first settlement was made on the Bay of Dan Dionisio in 1697. The establishment of the missions proper began immediately, and between this period and 1745 no fewer than fourteen were established on the peninsula. It was not until 1769 that the occupancy of Upper California was inaugurated by the founding of the mission of San Diego by the Franciscans, who had superseded the Jesuits in charge of mission work in western Spanish America. From this date until 1823 mission after mission was established to the number of twenty-one, until the entire coast area of California up to and a little beyond the Bay of San Francisco was under mission sway. As mission history forms one of the most interesting chapters relating to the aborigines of this continent, it is the purpose of the present paper to briefly notice the subject, with especial reference to some of the more salient features of mission life and its effects upon the nativs. . . .

California was probably more completely occupied than any other part of the United States. A large population is to be inferred from the proximity of the missions to each other, since each one required a populous area from which to draw its converts; and, finally, a large population is attested by the mission figures. which show that during the mission period, from 1769 to 1834, some seventy-nine thousand converts were baptized; and yet this number cannot by any means hav represented the total population for the sixty-five years, since by no means all the Indians were converted. . . .

The Spanish and Mexican authorities did not intend that the mission reign should be permanent. The approved plan of the government for the mission establishments contemplated these as but a temporary means to an end, and full provision was made for the conversion of the missions into secular establishments, quite independent of priestly authority, and for the conferring of citizenship upon the Indians. To this latter end it was provided that after ten years' service in the mission an Indian might claim his liberty, provided a respectable settler would become responsible for his good conduct. It was the clearly expressed idea of the government that the Indians should be rendered self-supporting as rapidly as possible, and the missions were looked upon as educational establishments to this end. Though not openly antagonizing these provisions, the fathers never yielded a hearty assent to the policy, and from the very first sought to render the converts totally dependent and to establish between themselvs and their charges the relation of father and children, in which policy they were only too successful. It was no part of their plan to make the Indian self-supporting. The danger of mission disestablishment disturbed the missionaries little, as they openly said the Indians were incapabie of self-maintenance.

When the missions were first established, the good fathers, as a rule, experienced little difficulty in securing converts. Kind words, and the gifts the Indians received in the shape of food and clothing, proved an efficient means of conversion, and they were baptized in gratifying numbers. Converts were encouraged to visit their wild brethren at home, and by flattering accounts of mission life induced many to return with them. As neophytes grew scarce, the area from which they were drawn was extended, and a greater or less number of recruits was obtained from the distant interior tribes. Later, such means proved unavailing, and other and more questionable methods were resorted to. Upon one pretext or another, armed soldiers and armed converts were sent out who frequently returned with a goodly number of captivs; and, for two reasons, these were mostly women and children: first, because they were preferred, since the husbands frequently followed them into captivity; and, secondly, because in the conflicts which preceded the capture of the wives and children many of the men were killed and the rest driven away. In these conflicts the wounded appear to hav received little mercy. Beechey witnessed the tragical issue of one of these holiday excursions by the neophytes of the mission of San José, and we are indebted to him for the details. An armed launch had been placed in charge of an alcalde of the mission, who while on the trip planned an attack upon the Cosemenes of the San Joakin, either directly for the purpose of securing converts or in revenge for some aggression. While in camp near the village they intended to attack, the neophyte party was surprised by the Cosemenes, and thirty-four were killed or taken captiv. In this case apparently the alcalde acted without authority, and doubtless without knowledge or connivance on the part of the priests. However, when the news reached the mission it was thought necessary to strike terror into the victorious tribe, and accordingly an expedition was sent against them. The result was that forty men, women, and children were captured and brought back to the mission. Thus the loss of the converts was more than made good, the surrounding tribes were inspired with terror, and all with the loss of one Christian, who was killed by the bursting of his own gun. Such acts reveal the darker side of mission history, and the attempt has been often made to free the priests from the blame of such transactions, on the ground that they were ignorant of the extreme means employed. Such can hardly hav been the case. Even when the ostensible purpose of the visits of the converts was peace and not war they were armed, the boat being often provided, as Beechy tells, with cannon and musketry. Under such circumstances of superiority it would hav needed no prophet to foretell the probable action of Indian neophytes, doubtless often with old grudges to pay off and eager to find favor in the eyes of their masters, and to claim the reward of their zeal in the new faith. Another fruitful occasion for wholesale capture was the escape of converts to neighboring tribes, and the attempt to recapture them by armed force, to which are to be added, of course, the petty manifestations of hostility on the part of the unconverted tribes. Overt acts on their part were followed by reprisals, and these always meant a fresh supply of converts.

Having gained possession of their subjects, the next step was to convert them to Christianity—a process neither very long nor tedious. Before baptism it was customary to prepare the candidates—if the term be applicable to unwilling captivs—by preliminary instruction, which the padres state never occupied less than eight days. How clear an insight into the mysteries of the Christian religion a pagan Indian, fresh from the worship of his fetiches, is likely to obtain in eight days may be imagined; but the fathers declared that the instruction was ample. The usual method of enlightenment is thus detailed by Beechey: "Immediately the Indians are brought to the mission they are placed under the tuition of some of the most enlightened of their countrymen, who teach them to repeat in Spanish the Lord's Prayer and certain passages in the Romish litany, and also to cross themselvs properly on entering the church. In a few days a willing Indian becomes a proficient in these mysteries, and suffers himself to be baptized and duly initiated into the church. If, however, as it not unfrequently happens, any of the captured Indians show a repugnance to conversion, it is the practice to imprison them for a few days, and then to allow them to breathe a little fresh air in a walk round the mission to observe the happy mode of life of their converted countrymen, after which they are again shut up, and thus continue to be incarcerated until they declare their readiness to renounce the religion of their forefathers." A remark by Beechey that he thought the teachers had an arduous task, elicited from the priest the reply that "they had never found any difficulty; that the Indians were accustomed to change their own gods, and that their conversion was in a manner habitual to them." This was undoubtedly true, as was evidenced by the rapidity with which numbers apostatized in favor of their earlier gods whenever occasion offered.

Disciplin among the converts was administered with some severity. As was to be expected, desertion and the non-performance of their religious duties were the chief occasions of punishment. A church service is thus described by Beechey (page 367): "After the bell had done tolling, several alguazils went round to the huts to see if all the Indians were at church, and if they found any loitering within them, they exercised with tolerable freedom a long lash, with a broad thong at the end of it—a disciplin which appeared the more tyrannical as the church was not sufficiently capacious for all the attendants, and several sat upon the steps without. The congregation was arranged on both sides of the building, separated by a wide aisle passing along the center, in which were stationed several alguazils with whips, canes, and goads to preserve silence and maintain order; and, what seemed more difficult than either, to keep the congregation in their kneeling posture. The goads were better adapted to this purpose than the whips, as they would reach a long way, and inflict a sharp puncture without making any noise. The end of the church was occupied by a guard of soldiers under arms, with fixed bayonets—a precaution which I suppose experience had taught the necessity of observing." The spectacle presented of church doors guarded by soldiers, and of attendants provided with whips and goads to prick the unwilling or ignorant into kneeling, is certainly not a very edifying spectacle according to later ideas, and savors far too much of slavery. Indeed, the resemblance was suggested to more than one eye-witness, and Pérouse finds in the system an unhappy resemblance to the slave plantations of Santo Domingo. He says: "With pain we say it, the resemblance is so perfect that we hav seen men and women in irons or in the stocks, and even the sound of the lash might hav struck our ears, that punishment being also admitted, though practiced with little severity." . . .

Estudillo says that the friars treated the neophytes as their children, correcting them with words, and for serious offenses with from twelve to twenty-five lashes. Subsequently the latter number was the extreme limit fixed by authority, the implication being that occasionally at least this number had been exceeded. A deserter, says Langsdorff, was bastinadoed, and an iron rod a foot or a foot and a half long was fastened to one of his feet. . . .

With reference to the grinding of corn, Langsdorff (1806), learning that the hand-mill which Pérouse, out of the kindness of his heart, left at the San Carlos Mission (1786), with the view to lighten the heavy labor of the mealing-stones, was not in existence, and that no use had been made of it as a model to manufacture others, records the curious fact that in perpetuating the use of the stone-grinding process the fathers were actuated by motivs of policy. To use his own words, "As they hav more men and women under their care than they could keep constantly employed the whole year, if labor were too much facilitated, they are afraid of making them idle by the introduction of mills." With the fathers the important question was, not how many converts can be well instructed, and by what method can their progress to civilization be best facilitated, but how many can be got together to be baptized and saved from the devil. Not improvement but conversion was their guiding motiv. . . .

It must be evident at once that such a system could not but prove an absolute failure as regards the true civilization of the Indian. . . .

From first to last of mission rule discontent was rife among the converts, and had the mission Indian possessed but a spark of the courage which characterizes our Eastern tribes, mission sway would hav been short-lived. Imagin a body of Iroquois driven to church by the whip, or forced to kneel by being punched with goads! The evidences of discontent appear in the threatened uprising at all the missions and the actual revolts at several, by the hostil attitude of all the gentile tribes who were brought into direct or indirect relation with the missions; and, above all, by the numerous yearly desertions at every establishment. The causes of trouble are not far to seek. In the first place it is evident that, call it by what name you will, the neophytes were subjected to a state of slavery—a slavery, too, which galled, however mild the type, but from which they found it exceedingly difficult to escape; for, in addition to the aid of the soldiers in hunting renegades, the priests could usually count upon the assistance of the gentile tribes to return fugitivs. The wild Indians hated the neophytes, and the rule among them was—once a neophyte always a neophyte. How strongly linked was the chain which bound the neophyte appears in the provision that, even when liberty was given him after ten years' service, a portion of his earnings was still claimed by the church. The crops the neophytes were compelled to sow were sown mainly for the profit of others, the harvests they reaped were not their own. Thus the usual incentivs of toil were absent. Though professedly regarded as a child by the fathers the Indian was virtually a slave. . . .

Possibly the most potent of all causes for discontent is to be ascribed to the fearful mortality which from the very first raged among the mission folds. Its sources are somewhat obscure, although it is safe to attribute it largely to what may be termed unnatural conditions of life. It is stated, and it may be readily believed, that when visited by even trifling disorders the Indian became despondent, generally refused to be ministered to, and often died without apparent adequate cause. The Indian has rarely much faith in civilized medical methods, and when really sick almost invariably prefers the ministrations of his own shaman. Moreover, in the case of the California Indians there is reason to believe that their want of faith in the skill of the padres was well founded; for both Beechey and Langsdorff, differing from Vancouver, note the astonishing amount of sickness among the converts, and comment upon the lack of medicins and the ignorance of the fathers as medical advisers.

At no time would it appear that the number of the births among the mission converts was equal to the deaths. According to Bandine, the governor states, in a report for 1800, that the number of deaths is almost double that of births; and again, in 1815, the president of the missions stated that there were three deaths to two births. It was only by perpetual drafts upon the surrounding tribes that the missions were sustained at all. When we take into consideration the unnatural herding together of large numbers of Indians under the most unsanitary conditions, practically without medicins and without proper medical attendance, the ordinary effect of disease being hightened by the dejection of the patients, and then add an epidemic or two of any of the above diseases, the probable result may easily be foretold. The wonder is, not that the Indians died off rapidly, but that any of them survived. . . .

As has been stated, the original plan of colonization contemplated the Indian as a citizen in individual possession of land, each with his share of the accumulated mission property, consisting of horses, cattle, sheep, etc. The experiment of giving the Indian his freedom, so long contemplated, was now (1834) to be tried. The fathers, facing the inevitable, recommended that a partial trial be made first, as they believed that the Indian was not ready for the experiment; and, indeed, how was it possible that he should be? Had the intention from the very first been to unfit him for independent existence, no better plan could hav been devised than the one actually followed. Educated he was not, except in the necessary portions of the ritual of the Catholic church, and in so far as a certain number spoke Spanish. Civilized he certainly was not, since his knowledge of the art of husbandry and of the manual arts was only sufficient to enable him to be a producer under taskmasters. He was, in fact, master scarcely of the rudiments of civilization. In short, at the end of mission rule, the Indian was really less capable of taking care of himself than at the beginning: he was found a free man—he was left a dependent.

Could the provisions of the secularization act hav been carried out gradually and honestly by capable officers and with the coöperation of the missionaries, even then it may be doubted if the intelligence and civilized attainments of the Indian would hav been equal to the occasion. As it was, political consideration prevented a fair trial of the plan, and the final act in the mission drama is little else but a history of robbery and oppression, in which the Indian, as usual, was the sufferer. The vast mission herds and flocks melted away; the implements which were intended for the use of the Indian farmers were not, as a rule, forthcoming; and, of course, without domestic animals and without the means of tillage, the land was of no use. The period from 1836 to 1842 was one of disaster in mission history. The downward path of the nativs was rapid. Those who obtained property sold it and converted the proceeds into liquor and then resorted to stealing, to flight to the wild tribes, or to return to bondage under the guise of servants in the town or on the ranches. In the area bstween the Bay of San Francisco and Los Angeles there are to-day probably not one hundred Indians. Of the so-called mission Indians in San Bernardino and Los Angeles counties, the last Indian report givs a population of 4,330. But very few of these are descendants of the mission Indians of Franciscan times.

Such, in brief outline, is the history of the mission Indians. They lived and died, and their few descendants now drag out a miserable existence in out-of-the-way places, so poor and barren as to be beyond the covetousness of the whites, or liv dependent wards of the government.

Indian Missions.

The account on another page of this paper of the administration of the Indian missions of California may be taken as an illustrativ specimen of Christian management the world over, and as well of white races as of red. We recommend that the reader of the article take thought at each instance of ecclesiastical misgovernment whether that case has not its parallel in the annals of every society dominated by priests. Let us consider in this light, for example, the following point:

"It was the clearly expressed idea of the government that the Indians should be rendered self-supporting as rapidly as possible, and the missions were looked upon as educational establishments to this end. Though not openly antagonizing these provisions, the fathers never yielded a hearty assent to the policy, and from the very first sought to render the converts totally dependent and to establish between themselvs and their charges the relation of father and children, in which policy they were only too successful. It was no part of their plan to make the Indian self-supporting. The danger of mission disestablishment disturbed the missionaries little, as they openly said the Indians were incapable of self-maintenance."

In a precisely parallel manner, it will occur to the reader, the priests hav always aimed, and still aim, to restrain their white wards from becoming "self-supporting." As the government in the excerpt looked upon the missions as "educational establishments to this end" of preparation for self-maintaining citizenship, so the governments of our cities are to-day too much inclined to look upon parochial schools and sectarian reformatories as serviceable training establishments, and intrust children to them as such. And as "the fathers never yielded a hearty assent" to the equipping of the Indians for independent life, but, without "openly antagonizing" the project, "sought to render the converts totally dependent, and to establish between themselvs and their charges the relation of father and children," just so, we point out, do our present ecclesiastics, while assuming to fit their charges for citizenship, in fact seek to render them totally dependent, and to perpetuate the relation of father and helpless children. We find that the mission fathers took pains to keep the Indians incapable of self-support, and then alleged that very incapability that they had produced as the reason why their rule should be continued; this scheme, we see, is capsble of perpetuating itself indefinitly. And we find its counterpart in the state of things presented to us by all churchmen of the day—they unceasingly protest to us that the masses must be restrained and led, that they are so blind and rude as positivly to require some threatening and perhaps despotic power over them, while it is these very protesters themselvs that hav kept the masses in this condition.

"Questionable methods were resorted to. Upon one pretext or another, armed soldiers and armed converts were sent out who frequently returned with a goodly number of captivs."

Cases analogous to this abound in the conversion to Christianity of every country. They not only abound, but they constitute the major part of the proselyting process. In nearly every country where Christianity exists to-day it was first established by force. In the Roman empire its adherents were few and obscure and persecuted until the chance of the conversion of the emperor Constantine produced an imperial enforcement of it throughout the domain. This fact, that Christianity to-day owes its multitude of believers not to its credibility but to despotic compulsion, should ever be borne in mind. The orthodox disputant is often heard to urge as proof of the truth of his faith, its general adoption at a date near the time of Christ's life and miracles, when the people had the best opportunity to know its believableness. To such argument it should always be replied that those people, who had that opportunity of knowing, did not believe it, and it was only after ages of persecution that they or their children were forced to discontinue the rites of their pagan belief and practice those of the new. It has been likewise in all the later European monarchies. In all of them the Christian religion is enabled to count its many followers for no other reason than that all the kings of the past hav suppressed every whisper of doubt by sword and fire. Not only does Christianity as a whole derive its existence from such measures, but each of its sects prevails in its respectiv nation or nations as against the other sects, only because it chanced to find reception, either as the truth or as the most serviceable instrument of despotism, with some monarch that happened to be reigning. The king of France listens to a papal emissary and the consequence is that uncountable Frenchmen down to the present day are solemnly convinced of the divineness of Roman Catholicism. They think that they really hav reasoned about it, and would be angry if told they had not. On the other hand, an English king falls out with the popish legate and since his time nine Englishmen out of ten are absolute that Catholicism is an abomination and that the holy truth lies in Church of England or Protestant articles. Let it, then, be replied to every Christian who argues that his creed is true because so many hundred millions believe it, that the belief of these millions counts simply as nothing, for it has its origin not in intellectual examination and reasoned conviction, but entirely in total absence of examination, and tyrannical suppression of the doubt of every strong-headed man for centuries past. Since tyranny's powers hav been curtailed, behold the weakening of belief and the strides of Freethinking; what, then, would be the condition of things to-day had freedom of thought and criticism been allowed to begin ten centuries sooner? If it has done what it has in one or two centuries, what could it hav done in a dozen? How much of Christianity would be remaining? And in regard to the forcible securing of mission proselytes noted in the above extract, let it be taken notice of that Indians thus converted are counted into that total of believers in the United States whose numbers are continually cited to Congress as grounds why further Christian enactments should be passed, to the oppression of us unbelievers.

"As was to be expected, desertion and the non-performance of their religious duties were the chief occasions of punishment."

"As was to be expected," indeed. Certainly it is the expectation of everyone who has read history that the chief crimes in any society ever administered by ecclesiastics will be desertion from the service of the priestly masters or laxity in the ceremonial which they command. Desertion to other service and government, and ceremonial default—these two offenses, heresy, and laxity of observance—hav ever been the blackest crimes in the church calendar, while murder, theft, arson, seduction, and slander hav held but a secondary place in culpableness. While the former were damning, the latter could always be wiped out at no greater expense than a confession and a gift. We do not read that among these Indians assault and robbery and falsehood were the offenses mainly aimed against; no, "the chief occasions of punishment" were denial of the lies invented by the priests about a God and of the assumption that they were his agents.

"The spectacle presented of church doors guarded by soldiers, and of attendants provided with whips and goads to prick the unwilling or ignorant into knceling, is certainly not a very edifying spectacle according to later ideas."

Though truly not an edifying spectacle according to later ideas, it was a highly edifying—a holy, a noble, a glorious spectacle according to the ideas of the European peoples who beheld such things a few ages ago. We hope that a few ages hence the ecclesiastics will not hav got the people, by governmental agency, back again in that state of mind in which they consider such sights edifying. We hope that the Jesuits and cardinals and Blairs and Wanamakers and Talmages of this land will never become strong enough to drive our sons in at "church doors guarded by soldiers" to the disciplin of "whips and goads to prick the unwilling or ignorant into kneeling." Certain it is that they would delight to do this if they had the power. We see what these priests told of in the excerpt did in this case where they had the power. They will do just the same with the white population of America to-day if they can get the chance.

"With reference to the grinding of corn, Langsdorff (1806), learning that the hand-mill which Pérouse, out of the kindness of his heart, left at the San Carlos Mission (1796), with the view to lighten the heavy labor of the mealing-stones, was not in existence, and that no use had been made of it as a model to manufacture others, records the curious fact that in perpetuating the use of the stone-grinding process the fathers were actuated by motivs of policy. To use his own words, 'As they hav more men and women under their care than they could keep constantly employed the whole year, if labor were too much facilitated, they are afraid of making them idle by the introduction of mills.'"

The inquiry will naturally be made, Why, as the desires of man are infinit, could not the fathers hav directed the labor of the Indians to some other useful manufacture after they had dispatched the grinding in short time by using the mills? The reason is that the fathers had no more branches of industry to which to direct their wards, for they were too ignorant of mechanics or any useful art—in short, of anything except their theology and their scheming—to operate or invent any. And as they eschewed all training of their flock such as might develop inquiry and invention toward such purposes, and in every way suppressed or misdirected all stir of intellect and action, there was no possibility of anyone's introducing or contriving any such enterprise. This has been the case with every priest-ridden society. The priests hav uniformly discouraged and repressed all inventiv talent—hav rooted out education in physics, mechanics, chemistry, and every natural science or art that would rival or discredit their own supremacy. Thus every Catholic country has remained as these missions are described, destitute of improved machinery and varied industries, performing its labor with the rudest tools and with but the crudest and fewest possible kinds of labor to perform.

"With the fathers the important question was, not how many converts can be well instructed, and by what method can their progress to civilization be best facilitated, but how many can be got together to be baptized and saved from the devil. Not improvement but conversion was their guiding motiv."

This has been the character of the rule in every deeply religious society. What method will best facilitate the progress of their wards to civilization, has never been inquired by the priests of Spain and Portugal and Italy and Greece and Russia and Ireland and Mexico and Central America and South America. On the contrary, the priests of these lands hav devoted their fiercest violence to the extermination of every discoverer in science and inventor in mechanics and reformer in government who dared to point the people to civilization. The thousands of priests at the head of our schools and academies are not inquiring what methods will best facilitate the progress of their wards to civilization. On the contrary, these priests forbid their pupils to read those books of advanced science which throw such a flood of light upon the world and the human condition, and will so greatly help us to see the way to our ends of security and happiness. And they discourage, indirectly if not directly, the reading by the pupils of any literature at all beyond the few wretched productions that will feed their devotion to their spiritual masters. And they teach their pupils, not the moral truth that a wrong act is a crime against men, and that it is inerasible and cannot be undone, but the devilishly immoral falsehood that a wrong act is a crime primarily against God, and can be undone by absolution purchased of them. These things do not facilitate progress to civilization. And with the Protestants it is the same. They were not facilitating civilization when they were massacreing Catholics and burning Servetus and drowning witches and persecuting scientists and maligning Darwin. To-day their pulpits and periodicals are not advocating, or even investigating, or even allowing the mention of, any of the reforms for which humanity is crying; every stroke of work in these departments has to be done in unbelieving circles or not at all. The Protestant Sunday-school teachers and the lecturers and the parents are not facilitating civilization; instead, they are preaching the paramount duty of devoting all one's efforts to those theological insanities that, when thoroughly believed and acted on, are death to all civilization. No, civilization has nowhere been more the aim of religious ministers than it has in these missions. Not how people can be civilized, but how they can "be got together to be baptized" into a condition of service and remunerativness to the baptizers—"not improvement but conversion"—has been and will be the object of clerics in all places and times.

"Even when liberty was given him after ten years' service, a portion of his earnings was still claimed by the church. The crops the neophytes were compelled to sow were sown mainly for the profit of others, the harvests they reaped were not their own. Thus the usual incentivs of toil were absent."

This feature of administration is also as common to all clerically ruled societies as are the others descanted upon. Whenever ecclesiastics hav had their own way they hav associated with themselvs some monarch or some nobility, and the two classes —church robbers by deceit and state robbers by force—hav erected themselvs over the people's head and extorted the greater part of their earnings. The masses under church sway hav invariably been compelled to sow "mainly for the profit of others" and reap harvests "not their own." "Thus," says the account, "the usual incentivs of toil were absent." And this, the absence of the natural incentivs to toil, is a fatal thing. Where men receive the fruit of their toil, the whole of it, and in amount just proportionate to the labor they hav bestowed; and where they can hold and enjoy it in security—there will be seen an industrious, provident, inventiv, progressiv, and comparativly crimeless race. On the other hand, where a man's produce is not his own; where whether he labor ill or well his utmost return can be but a sufficiency for the support of life; where no prospect of reward stimulates to thrifty management and to invention—there progress halts, hope flags, dissoluteness springs, and the activ faculties, denied their healthful vent, expend themselvs in crime.

"Fearful mortality . . . from the very first raged among the mission folds. . . . There is reason to believe that their want of faith in the skill of the padres was well founded; for both Beechy and Langsdorff, differing from Vancouver, note the astonishing amount of sickness among the converts, and comment upon the lack of medicins and the ignorance of the fathers as medical advisers."

This characteristic of priestly administration will readily be generalized by readers to the inclusion of the similar state of things in all Europe during the Middle Ages, and in the Catholic countries up to our day. Pagan antiquity valued and cherished health. The Roman cities vied in the establishment of free public baths. Antioch boasted of fourteen; Alexandria of twelve, and Rome of twenty, some of such magnificence and extent that their foundations hav withstood the ravages of twenty centuries. Many of these establishments were entirely free, and even the Thermæ, or luxurious Warm Baths, of Caracalla, admitted visitors for a gate-fee of the cheapest. What such attention to health in the one point of bathing alone, would hav effected among these Indians herded together "under the most unsanitary conditions," may be supposed to be considerable. But the pagan appreciation of health no longer existed; antiquity's baths, and athletic games, and dawning medical science that might in a few centuries hav gained much of the efficacy of that of the present age, these had all been overwhelmed in the Christian neglect of nature and devotedness to chimeras that rose and filled the world. "The deadliest blow," says Dr. Oswald, "to the cause of health was struck by the anti-natural fanaticism of the Middle Ages, the world-hating infatuation of the maniacs who depreciated every secular blessing as a curse in disguise, and despised their own bodies as they despised nature, life, and earth. The disciples of the world-renouncing messiah actually welcomed disease as a sign of divine favor, they gloried in decrepitude and deformity, and promoted the work of degeneration with a persevering zeal never exceeded by the enlightened benefactors of the human race. For a period of fifteen hundred years the ecclesiastical history of Europe is the history of a systematic war against the interests of the human body; the 'mortification of the flesh' was enjoined as a cardinal duty of a true believer; health-giving recreations were suppressed, while health-destroying vices were encouraged by the example of the clergy; domestic hygiene was utterly neglected, and the founders of some twenty-four different monastic orders vied in the invention of new penances and systematic outrages upon the health of the poor convent-slaves. Their diet was confined to the coarsest and often most loathsome food; they were subjected to weekly bleedings, to profitless hardships and deprivations; their sleep was broken night after night; fasting was carried to a length which often avenged itself in permanent insanity, and their only compensation for a daily repetition of health-destroying afflictions was the permission to indulge in spiritual vagaries and spirituous poisons; the same bigots who grudged their followers a night of unbroken rest or a mouthful of digestible food indulged them in quantities of alcoholic beverages that would hav staggered the conscience of a modern beer-swiller. The bodily health of a community was held so utterly below the attention of a Christian magistrate that every large city became a hotbed of contagious diseases; smallpox and scrofula became pandemic disorders; the pestilence of the Black Death ravaged Europe from end to end—nay, instead of trying to remove the cause of the evil, the wretched victims were advised to seek relief in prayer and self-torture, and a philosopher uttering a word of protest against such illusions would hav risked to hav his tongue torn out by the roots and his body consigned to the flames of the stake."

"At no time would it appear that the number of the births among the mission converts was equal to the deaths."

This is to be classified with the records of European mortality under priestly rule. "Latin Christianity," says Professor Draper, "in a thousand years could not double the population of Europe; it did not add perceptibly to the term of individual life. But, as Dr. Jarvis, in his report to the Massachusetts board of health, has stated, at the epoch of the Reformation 'the average longevity in Geneva was 21.21 years; between 1814 and 1833 it was 40.68; as large a number of persons now liv to seventy years as lived to forty three hundred years ago.' . . . The physical value of shrine cures and ghostly remedies is measured by the death rate. . . . Systems of philosophy and forms of religion find a measure of their influence on humanity in census returns."

"The Indian was not ready for the experiment [of freedom]; and, indeed, how was it possible that he should be? Had the intention from the very first been to unfit him for independent existence, no better plan could hav been devised than the one actually followed. Educated he was not, except in the necessary portions of the ritual of the Catholic church, and in so far as a certain number spoke Spanish. Civilized he certainly was not, since his knowledge of the art of husbandry and of the manual arts was only sufficient to enable him to be a producer under taskmasters. He was, in fact, master scarcely of the rudiments of civilization. In short, at the end of mission rule, the Indian was really less capable of taking care of himself than at the beginning: he was found a free man—he was left a dependent."

Here we find a comprehensiv description of the Catholic immigrant who is daily becoming a more conspicuous and alarming figure in this country. "Educated he is not, except in the necessary portions of the ritual of the Catholic church"—how unfit he is rendered by this ineducation to perform the functions of a voting sovereign of a free state, we see in the government of our Catholic cities. "Civilized he certainly is not," and until he is civilized we all must suffer from his abuses of our institutions and tremble at his endangerment of our republic. The last sentence of the above extract suggests the parallel: At the end of clerical rule the European pagan, found rational and manly at the beginning of the Christian era, "was really less capable of taking care of himself than at the beginning: he was found a free man—he was left a dependent."

"They lived and died, and their few descendants now drag out a miserable existence in out-of-the-way places, so poor and barren as to be beyond the covetousness of the whites, or liv dependent wards of the government."

So, too, all the Christian generations of the past lived and died, and those descendent nationalities who yet remain in devoted belief "drag out a miserable existence in out-of the-way places," and "liv dependent wards" of the countries of Freethought.

Brazil.

The much-talked-of Brazilian constitution has at last been published in full. The preamble sets forth that congress is to meet on November 15th, and shall hav full power to confirm, amend, or repeal the various articles of the constitution. The national congress shall consist of two branches—the house of representativs and the senate. In no case may the republic enter upon a war of conquest. The people shall be permitted to hold mass meetings, and the police shall not interfere with them unless it be necessary to maintain peace. The right of petition and free speech shall also be allowed. Sealed or closed correspondence shall be inviolable, and no person shall receive punishment in place of another. The galleys as a punitiv institution shall be abolished, and persons convicted of political crimes shall no longer be punished with death. Governors of states, chiefs of police, clergymen, officers of the army and navy, and government officials cannot serve as members of congress. The following persons will not be allowed to vote at federal or state elections: Those who liv by begging, those who cannot read and write, and soldiers and clergymen. The republic will recognize only civil marriages, which shall always take place before the religious ceremony. The cemeteries shall be secular and shall not be controled by any religious sect. Religion shall not be taught in the public schools, neither shall any church receive an official subsidy. Jesuits shall be excluded from the country, and the foundation of any new convents or monastic orders is prohibited.

Brazil proposes wise laws. We wish her full success in establishing and perpetuating them, in despite of the wily and malignant clericals whom she has disseated and who are now taxing all their low cunning to procure her downfall.

Editorial Notes.

JUDGE MCSHERRY, of Frederick, Md., has filed an opinion declaring that "baseball playing on Sunday by men who are under contract for the season at stated salaries, no one being admitted to witness the games except those who pay, can be construed as nothing else than work, and therefore comes within the purview of the prohibitory statute." Preaching is done on Sunday "by men who are under contract for the season at stated salaries, no one being admitted to witness the games except those who pay." Will Judge McSherry now kindly construe this as "nothing else than work," and decide that it "therefore comes within the purview of the prohibitory statute?"

MR. GLADSTONE has been delivering a protest against woman's rights. He bases his protest characteristically on theological, or perhaps religious, grounds. He is against any reform which "attempts or affects to alter fundamentally the relation which the almighty himself has established and the design of which he has marked out in our constitutions and capacities, to alter that relation, to draw woman essentially out of her own sphere, and to expect her to exchange it for the sphere of man, or to act in both with the presumption that she can act in both one and the other with equal efficiency." Mr. Gladstone's familiarity with the designs of the almighty is an article of faith with all good Gladstonians. But those who are not Gladstonians will throw his trashy deliverance on the floor with an exclamation of "Fudge!" and a feeling that he ought to hav died before disgracing his country with any further examples of foolishness deduced from divine command.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50. Send me the picture book, and apply the balance on my account. I vote for the pictures, also for John Peck and Wettstein. They are the kind of writers that suit me. But I like them all, if some of them hav but half-way shaken off the claws of superstition. Yours truly, W. E. HUNTER.

MOSCOW, IDA., July 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Since my name appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav received samples of all the other Liberal papers, and I hav taken each one for three or six months, but as I am unable to support more than one outside paper, I will fall back on THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I shall take as long as I can raise the money for it. A. L. MCFARLANE.

CLEVELAND, O., July 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose you $5—three for THE TRUTH SEEKER and two for the new Bible when ready. I am for the pictures, not only front and back but on every page. I hav three boys and one daughter "grown;" it is a grab game as to who gets the paper first to see the pictures. Watson Heston, more power to your elbow!

JAMES HENDERSON.

COALPORT, PA., July 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please inform me if there are any Liberal papers or magazines printed in German in the United States? A very intelligent, Liberal, old German neighbor of mine is delighted with the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but cannot read English, and requested me to inquire of you for the desired information. I will order the picture book as soon as it is published. JOS. RHODY.

[We are happy to inform your friend that his wishes will be met in the Freidenker, published at 470 E. Water street, Milwaukee, Wis.—ED. T. S.]

CAÑON CITY, COL., July 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, one copy of "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and one copy of A. Jacobson's "Bible Inquirer." THE TRUTH SEEKER is the most effectiv and best Liberal Freethought paper in the United States, if not in the whole world, and no Infidel to Christianity can well afford to do without it. Heston's pictures add considerably to its attractivness and value. Keep them up by all means.

G. P. BRENE.

MILLSVILLE, N. S., June 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I here send you $2 to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER alive as long as I liv myself, and so that it should be printed as long as a priest is to be found in the land, and that Heston may hav a good picture in each one. All the pictures that are in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC should be put up in one book, and all the pictures that are on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER in a book, and then we would hav a pictorial Bible.

Yours for truth and right, JOHN SILLARS ARTHUR.

RACINE, WIS., July 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We admire the grand paper with all its noble writers. We hav taken it almost from its commencement, and cannot do without it. Heston is a brick—no, I mean a whole foundation; a solid one that no wind can rock, and he sets many minds steady daily, others building up fast by the absurdity of his wonderful pictures. I sincerely hope they will long continue. With the subscribers, we join in three cheers and a bravo for Heston.

Yours for Truth, Reason, and Liberty,
MRS. T. BRUDAHL.

ELM SPRINGS, ARK., July 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am only sixteen years old, but I want to say to all the girls that read THE TRUTH SEEKER that we should meet in convention and pass such resolutions as would giv the legislativ and judicial departments of our government to understand, once for all, that it is not the best thing they can do to be imprisoning such men as Mr. Heywood, Harman, and Reid. Inclosed find $3, for which send me the picture book, and the balance apply on father's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and one ANNUAL. And let me be heard on the line herein expressed.

Yours for justice, HATTIE DAY.

CONCORD, N. C., July 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Sam Jones, the revivalist, the evangelist, uses coarse and crazy language in his preaching that has sent one young lady to meet Jesus. Miss Mattie Wilson some months since attended Sam Jones's meetings, in Charlotte, where the religious excitement unbalanced her mind, with the sad result of suicide. Another victim of Sam Jones's preaching is a Mr. McCullough. He lost his mind and is now in the asylum. Mr. McCullough was an industrious blacksmith, and provided well for his family until Sam Jones came to Charlotte and put seven devils in him, which caused him to be torn from his family and sent to the asylum—worse than death. J. W. MEHAFFEY.

OMAHA, NEB., July 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to communicate a few lines to the noble Truth Finder. You expect all of your subscribers to say a little, and you can judge whether they are progressing. I did feel glad this morning, when I read the letter, of E. H. Baker's progress. I think I can see his countenance beaming with joy. Oh, the villainous doctrin—born to be eternally damned! I do not like W. Hart's proposition, in the same paper, to find how many Spiritualists there are who take the paper, it, in my opinion, being calculated to bring on debates and finally inharmony. Let us fight the big monster, Superstition, and keep in harmony ourselvs. I am not ashamed, for one. To me it is past all controversy.

W. L. GRAY.

BURLINGTON, KAN., July 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Is there harm in swearing? "I don't care a damn." This originated with the duke of Wellington. A damm is a small piece of India money. The meaning of the phrase, I don't care a damn, is, I care but little. So there is no harm in its use. The word goddam is a root word of the English tongue. So if you wish to giv an English scholar high praise for his elegant language, tell him he uses a goddam tongue. The Greeks swore by the cabbage, because it was a prized vegetable with them. The ancient Romans swore by their gods, and sometimes by their planets—by Jupiter and Mars, or by Castor, a god. "By jingo," is swearing. Jingo is derived from jincoa, a Basque god. Barbarous nations swore by the heads of their rulers. To swear is a way we hav to affirm a truth. There is no harm in the habit. Only it looks foolish. We need not use swearing words when we can utter nicer language.

W. C. RANDLEMAN, Phrenologist.

BLOOMSDALE, O., July 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav often thought that if society or public opinion could be educated into the idea of the propriety of removing persons who hav become a burden to themselvs or their surroundings, either by old age or continued incurable disease, by the administration of chloroform, opium, or any of the slower or faster methods of ending life, and thereby doing away with prolonged suffering and misery, as well as unnecessary physicians' bills, it would certainly be a step in advance in the way of the amelioration of the sufferings of humanity. A certain old lady here has been suffering with cancer of the breast for three years and cannot liv or die. It would be a great relief to this community to hear that she had ended her pain. It should be considered legal, in case the patient so desired it (or, if unable to comprehend the situation, the relativs), that the doctor be ordered to administer the necessary drug to obtain the desired result. When we hav animals in a suffering and incurable condition we almost always relieve them by forcible death. C. C. GERMAIN.

BOWIE, TEXAS, July 24, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 19th a letter from Josiah Friend, Roanoke, Va., asking your opinion, and that of your readers, in reference to organizing a secret society for mutual support and protection, referring to Masons and Odd Fellows. I heartily indorse the move. I hav been an Odd Fellow for several years. I love the order, except the God idea. It is a good institution, has relieved thousands of brothers and done untold good otherwise. But the time has come when there is need of a society that will recognize the Freethought people and their views. I know, of a certainty, that good men and true hav been rejected for no other cause than their honest convictions in regard to the Bible, etc. I do think that if Liberals (Masons and Odd Fellows) would get to work they could organize a secret society on the principles of Odd Fellowship (which I know to be good), that all Liberal people could unite with and work with for the improvement and elevation of mankind; for drawing them together by bonds of love for the promotion of moral culture and the suppression of vice, seeking neither political nor ecclesiastical powers, only devoting itself steadily and earnestly to its special mission. By the bed of sickness, in the home made desolate by death, and wherever its widows and orphans are found struggling with poverty, there we should be found doing our noble work. We should organize—organize on such principles, and upon an indestructible foundation of true friendship and love, that at its door the wealth of a Rothschild would avail naught in securing admission, and yet there the poor and needy brother would knock not in vain. No patent of nobility would alone be sufficient to secure to its possessor recognition within the charmed circle of its surroundings, and yet there the woe-burdened and grief-stricken widow should be welcomed to sympathy and protection. Upon its walls no blood-stained banners would hang, but within would be found the power to protect, and the courage to defend, the fatherless wards of our order.

Fraternally, S. P. BENTON.

U. S. MILITARY HOME, WIS., July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th I read the proceedings of the court of the church of Rome in the case of Galileo, when it was proclaimed that the theory which he advanced "is a most grave error, since in no way can an opinion be probable which has been declared and defined to be contrary to holy scripture." When the Copernican system became firmly established as a truth, and not a probability, the "infallible" church should hav crept into a hole and buried itself in oblivion forever.

The Romish church is, and ever has been, the friend of ignorance, and a foe to the enlightenment of the human race. A year or two ago a Catholic paper said: "All the education needed by the masses is to be able to read the catechism," and, he should hav added, count a string of beads; that is about all the education they will receive in the schools of that church. If the parents are satisfied to allow their children thus to grow up and only be able to gain a livelihood with a pick and shovel, they should prepare themselvs for the damnation—to use a biblical expression—that will surely fall upon their heads when their children arrive at manhood. CHAUNCEY BROWN.

CHICAGO, July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: How often we see such phrases as "Swept into eternity," "Blown into eternity," and the like, in our secular newspapers, in flaming headlines to attract attention to some disastrous cyclone, flood, fire, or other calamity where there has been great loss of human life. One would think that a person capable of editing such a paper as the Chicago daily News would know that such phrases are the merest nonsense. I wish to show that, taking any view of the case you wish, a person is never "blown," "swept," or otherwise sent into eternity at death. Now, what is the meaning of the word "eternity?" Webster says, "Duration, without beginning or end." Even according to the view of orthodox Christians, it cannot be true that a soul commences on eternity at death according to the above definition. If man is an immortal being, he was always in eternity, even as an individual soul. On the other hand, if, as Secularists believe, man ceases to exist as a conscious being when this life goes out, he, as an individual, was "blown," "swept," "hurled," or otherwise sent into eternity at birth, and as such goes out of eternity at death. As matter, in one form or another, we always were and always will be in eternity.

Please send me a petition for signatures in the interest of Moses Harman. While I am not in favor of publishing such articles as he does, yet I see that his was a case of "the squelching a heretic." Faithfully, JOHN HUDSON.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to publish the following Obituary notice: Alvin M. Brooks died at home in Skamokawa, Wash., June 23, 1890, aged sixty-two. He was born in New York, came to this coast in 1857, which year and until 1861 he spent in Montana in company with his brother Allen E. Brooks, engaged in mining. In 1869 he came to Skamokawa with his two brothers, Washington and Allen E., where he has since lived. There were but two settlers in Skamokawa prior to their coming—H. Lowell, who survives him, and Mr. Spaulding, long since passed to the silent land. He was buried on the home he redeemed from the forest and made to blossom as the rose, on June 25th, and there, with the faithful heart who loved and cared for him in his last illness, and whose first separation has come in twenty years, may his slumber be sweet. Uncle Alvin is gone, and his place in the hearts of those who loved him can never be filled. By request of the relativs, S. F. Albert read the Liberal services over his remains, and Mrs. Albert sang, "Lay Him Low: His Work is Done." A large number of his friends met to pay the last tribute of respect to one of whom it can well be said, "none knew him but to love him." His life was one of uprightness and integrity. Our heartfelt sympathy is extended to the bereaved relativs, but this thought will help them to bear the heavy blow: "If duties well performed bring peace, how sweet will be his rest." He was a lifelong Freethinker, and his loss is a heavy one to our cause.

MR. EDITOR: "Death Ends All; or, The Mysteries of Life and Death." Such is the title of a pamphlet by Walter Hague, Pittsburgh, Pa. I do not know why that proposition is not as dogmatic as the contradiction. How is one to know whether death ends all unless he has knowledge when he is dead, and if he has, of course he knows death has not ended all? The first question to settle is the one of whether there be any death. Life is manifest in various forms of being—the vegetable and the animal life we see continually transformed into each other. How do we know how many other modes there may be of living? To say that there is one, and make that dogma the dictum of authority because it cannot be proved there is not, is the religious or mystical procedure; to say that there is none because it cannot be proved that there is, and throw out as fools and frauds and cranks all who say they believe there is another life, or continuous, conscious individual being after death, is perhaps more plausible on the face of appearances, but no less dictatorial and assuming in practice and logic. Life and death are alike mysteries and all we know of either is by natural revelation. The natural would be incapable of understanding any supernatural, no matter what attempts the one might make to impress the other. There are multitudes who state they hav had experiences with those called dead—spoken with their spirit, ghosts, or whatever it may be that survives, and among these are nameable persons unexcelled in their repute for honesty and sagacity. Though their say-so does not make it so, yet it is an over-assumption to say they did not simply because we hav never had the like experience. And if we think we hav, what can any negativ argument amount to to us anyway? Mr. Hague's book is a short and unpretentious summary of the usual arguments for the no soul, no future life theory, and contains the common inaccuracies of other writers on the subject. For instance, he says: "I shall consider this positiv proof that consciousness is a natural property of an electric current generated by the conscious part of the nerves and brain." Consciousness generated by the electric current of the conscious part is too too-too to be proved by anything. You might as well say that capacity was generated by the wind blowing through the capacious part of the bunghole and barrel. How did the part become conscious? That is the question before the senate.

GREENWICH VILLAGE, MASS., July 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send a copy of the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the persons named in the inclosed list. I order THE TRUTH SEEKER sent to those persons because I think it contains the best arguments against the Christian superstition that I can find. I am glad you hav concluded to publish a book of pictures, as I think they are an unanswerable argument against the theory of Christianity, showing ridiculous and unreasonable sides. In truth, the whole system of theology is entirely opposed to reason or common sense, and has been forced upon mankind by fire and sword, and the intelligent Christian knows it cannot be sustained by argument. Hence the Christian efforts to get God into the Constitution and Jesus acknowledged as king of nations. And yet the people do not seem to think our liberty is in any danger; do not seem to see that the priest will tell us what the will of God is, will speak for God and act for him. They do not see that the church will rule the nation. And if anyone wants to know what will happen then let him read history and see what did happen when the church ruled, and he may hav some idea of what will happen if the church again gets the power.

If all those who do not believe the Christian theory would withhold their support from the church, it would die of its own accord in a short time, but there are thousands of unbelievers that pay their money to support the Christian superstition, and some send their children to Christian Sunday-schools, and see no harm in reading the Bible and giving religious instruction in our public schools. Now, this is all wrong. They ought to pay something for the advancement of right, truth, and justice; then our liberties would be safe.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a constant reader of your excellent paper for more than five years, although I am not a subscriber, as I am engaged in the theatrical business and constantly traveling, so I get my paper through the newsdealers, and sometimes they are as much as five and six weeks old.

I think Liberals make a mistake by not making more of an effort to hav Liberal speakers to officiate on Decoration day, Washington's birthday, and especially the Fourth of July, as a vast amount of good could be accomplished with but little effort. I was at Ilwaco, Washington, on this last Fourth as the speaker was naming over the various ones who hav been prominent in achieving our independence. He said, "And that greatest of all patriots, champion of liberty and independence, Thomas Paine, the man who first spoke those immortal words: 'These United States of America must and ought to be free and independent.' "The speaker was unknown to me, and as it was so unlooked-for and so unexpected, and as the program had been opened with prayer by the village minister, my blood mounted to my face, and the tears to my eyes, and before I knew it I gave one tremendous hurrah, and commenced to clap my hands with all my might, and the entire audience of six or seven hundred joined in, and I knew the sky-pilot could hav crawled through a knot-hole.

The Liberals of Washington hav much to be elated over in regard to the reading of the Bible and singing of hymns in the public schools, as the superintendent of public instruction has informed various school boards that if they wish public moneys to defray the expenses of the school they must desist from allowing any religious services in the school whatever.

I think that your article headed, "The Union of Church and State," and that by "A Missionary at Sea," headed, "The True Inwardness of the National Reform Party," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 28th, ought to be published in pamphlet form and distributed broadcast over the land, as even the senators do not realize how much there is of union between church and state in this country. But the theatrical people realize it, though.

Yours for truth, liberty, and independence,

A. G. ALLEN.

ATTLEBORO, MASS., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 5th that Mr. Jesse Maurer, of Harmony, Ind., wants to know how our heavenly father did not make Eve at the same time that he made Adam, and of the same material. If friend Maurer will read the first two chapters of Genesis he will see that the creation of Adam was an afterthought with our heavenly father and his partner, as we read in Gen. i, 26, that after God had got through with making the beasts and creeping things, and so got his hand in, as it were, he said to his partner, "Let us make man in our own image and likeness, and let him hav dominion over the fish of the sea," etc. "So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him, male and female created he them." Now, it is evident that this man and woman were created about the same time and of the same mud. But for some good reason it seems our heavenly father and his partner were dissatisfied with the father's first effort at man-making, so these two, although made in his own image and likeness, and blessed by him and told to multiply, were discarded and disowned. Now, let us see what the reason was. The first man and woman were made on the sixth day. Then came the Sabbath, and how many more days we hav no account, but in the fifth verse of the second chapter of the same book we read that there was not a man to till the ground. But as the ground must be tilled, and the man and woman already made, being gorillas, would not work, our heavenly father and his partner went to work and made another man, and waited awhile to see if he would work. By the time that God found out that this last man would work, the dust that he had used to make him of was all gone, blown away perhaps. So he was obliged to chloroform him, and take out one of his ribs and make a woman of it. Now, if we only had a photograph of this first man that would not work we should know just how God looks, as he was made in the image and likeness of God. But we are not informed whether Adam was made in the image and likeness of any God or not. However, our heavenly father and his partner seem to hav met with fair success in the last effort to make a breed of men that would work. Eve also, who was made out of Adam's rib, very soon went to work gathering fruit for herself and husband. Now, it is as plain as day to any thinking person that the man and woman spoken of in Gen. i, 26, were a pair of gorillas, who, of course, would not cultivate the ground, hence he was obliged to make Adam and Eve. This reasonable view of the matter also helps us to see how Cain got his wife. He simply went over to the land of Nod, courted the finest young gorilla maiden he could find, married her, and set up for himself. This also accounts for the origin of the negro race, who are the descendants of Cain and his gorilla wife. In conclusion, I would advise friend Maurer not to doubt the holy Bible until he has studied it carefully.

E. C. SLY.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I was born and brought up an Infidel, and by nature am very skeptical. Prove all things, has ever been my motto. I hav proved to myself the existence of a life beyond the grave—the immortality of the intelligence, will power, consciousness, or mind of human individualities. It is not a matter of belief. There is no such thing as belief in my idea of continued life; a man must know the fact, must hav positiv proof.

I subscribe to THE TRUTH SEEKER for I believe in free, open discussion of all subjects. I hav no fear but that the truth will stand all the criticism that the human mind is capable of using against it. Anything with regard to life after what we call death, that will not stand and assert itself, in spite of doubt, denial, and scientific investigation, is not true.

I notice several writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER hav remarked that Spiritualists hav said, "Why take this belief from us?" I do not believe that expression ever came from a Spiritualist. Why should we fear losing the knowledge of a demonstrated fact? The subject cannot be argued too much to suit me.

We view the phenomena of nature from different standpoints, no two alike, so a fact to me has no meaning to one who had not been so situated or conditioned as to receive the same truth. After learning the fact of a life hereafter, as we turn back over the pages of history, the Bible, and the writings of eminent minds, there is a new meaning to it all. Mr. Longshore in his last article, "Immortality of Man," says: "But in an immortal existence there can be no wear, no waste, no decay, no end; no use for thought, for reason, for mental or moral effort. It is simply to exist without a purpose or a capability, without motiv or emotion. To be obliged to exist in this torpid, morbid, inactiv, purposeless state, and that eternally, is a conception revolting to a conscious being, abhorrent to reason and humanity." Yes, indeed, it is a revolting conception, and could be entertained only by a Materialist who believes that to be the condition if there is an existence. How easy it seems to be for some Materialists to describe what the conditions are of a life they know not of. I used to figure it out myself about the same way, but when I learned the truth, I could not help but think how silly my expressions must hav seemed to those who had the light.

I hav no use for churches—never had. They are of no benefit to humanity. They profit on the ignorance and hypocrisy of the people. And hand in hand with the church is another monster that feeds upon the ignorance and fear of the people; that is the medical profession. These two humbugs are two great curses to the world, education being the only remedy for the evils that come from them. As people become enlightened as to the requirements of the physical organization and understand the effects of the different foods used in sustaining it, and put in practice the knowledge obtained, just so fast do they do away with the professional M.D.'s, and their pernicious practices of keeping people under the weather for the purpose of bleeding them of all the cold cash they think they can get. There are good people among them, but like the church they hav a common purpose, and are protected by one of the worst laws against freedom this country has ever had. The physicians of this country are largely of the Liberal element, and if they believe in liberty they should hav such laws repealed at once. I believe this M.D. question should be brought before the people as much as the question of religious freedom. They both concern our health and happiness here.

In conclusion I will say a word in reply to Mr. Josiah Friend regarding a secret society. I myself do not believe a secret society can ever benefit the world. The Liberal people would make a blunder, in my judgment, to even agitate the question. It is contrary to freedom and the principles of our government. We do not need any secret work. The more openly and freely we express ourselvs at all times, the better. Stand by the Constitution. If necessary to organize, let it be on the basis of freedom, with the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence for by-laws. We need no secret signs. Let the work be done openly before the world.

DIXIE, WASH., July 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In Editorial Notes in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 5th you ask for a scientific explanation of the case of A. H. Walker, who changed, or is reported to hav changed, his mind in regard to religion, just before his death; he having written to you in February indorsing your paper and the cartoons, and about the middle of May, according to Mrs. Walker, having utterly repudiated them. You state the fact of Mrs. Walker being a Christian as a possible factor in the solution of the problem. The lady is an entire stranger to me, but knowing nothing to the contrary, I shall assume that she is sincere and honest, and reported facts to you, in her letter.

The following explanation of the case is hardly scientific, but it may contain a ray of light. Nothing but a more thorough knowledge of the laws of mind than we now possess, will secure a full explanation.

It is well known that in old age the mind retains most perfectly the impressions made on it in youth. The octogenarian may describe events that occurred seventy years ago, and seem to see every face that figures in his story, remembering the slightest occurrences in their minutest details, perfectly, while the events of the past few years, yes, even of yesterday, he knows nothing of. More than that; he not only is able more readily to call to mind the scenes of long ago, but he takes far greater pleasure in contemplating those mental pictures of the past than in realities of the present. But this is not the case to any great extent until the mind begins to lose its vigor.

A mind enfeebled by disease is often found to be in the same condition as one weakened by age. The invalid, especially if the victim of some lingering disease, will recur with pleasure to events of his early life, while the present has no charms for him whatever. This becomes more marked as death approaches.

It thus often occurs that one who, in the full possession of his faculties, knows the Bible uninspired and full of contradictions, absurdities, and immoralities, turns when by sickness his mental faculties are blurred, to the teachings of his early life. If anyone can explain why aged persons take such pleasure in, and recollect so clearly, the scenes of their childhood, while the intervening years are a blank, then can the case of Mr. Walker be explained.

But some may ask, "Why does the mind of a dying man so often revert to religion? Why not to other teachings of his younger days?" The answer is evident. Most persons hav been taught, as I was when a child, that death is the most important event in the earthly career of a human being; that when death comes we shall be able to see more clearly than during life, the reality of religion; that at the hour of death we shall know what our condition in the future life shall be; that death is the gate to eternal happiness or everlasting woe. Such teachings from their very nature must make a deeper impression on the mind of the child than any other. Besides these teachings, we are told that the Bible is a true moral guide, and that happiness comes only from believing and obeying its precepts. With many, some of the pleasantest hours of childhood are spent in studying the Bible or in listening to Bible stories from a fond mother's lips—and the Bible contains many beautiful, many pathetic, many sublime stories and descriptions.

It is only in after years that we learn that the good in the so-called word of God is more than counterbalanced by the evil; that the idea of a heaven and a hell is absurd; that death is not an awakening of the mind, but a falling asleep.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that many Infidels, children of religious parents, on their dying beds, or in their advanced years, turn to those forcible and somewhat beautiful instructions received in early life, and renounce their Infidelity.

The writer's parents were Christians and gave him religious instruction. He attended Sunday-school and church for several years, and became a church-member at sixteen; but thorough examination of the Bible, without having ever seen an Infidel publication or heard an Infidel lecture, convinced him of the impossibility of the Bible being inspired. I know Christianity is false, and I hope the time will soon come when it will exist only in history. I am one of the most radical of Radicals so far as disbelief in the Bible is concerned. But if, by sickness or age, my mental faculties are impaired, my judgment grows obtuse, my memory returns to early years and presents those early teachings, while the result of latter investigations is forgotten, and I am led to say that Christianity is true, I hope that none of my friends will so dishonor my memory as to say that "his mind became clear before death," and he saw Infidelity in its true light. It would be an insult to say that my judgment is not so good now, while in the full possession of my mental faculties, as it will be when all are fading away into that dreamless and eternal sleep called death.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

At Evening Time.

As I sat musing at even time,
When nature seemed so still,
A little bird in a far-off tree
A song began to thrill.

In fancy I could read its song,
And it sang of hope to me;
It sang of my brave and noble boy
That was out upon the sea.

I dreamed last night in a wakeful sleep
That the ship my boy did man
Was wrecked and lost on a hidden reef
As it was coming in to land.

I could almost hear his cry for help,
As the ship rocked on the waves.
I could almost see his noble form,
As the crew he tried to save.

I woke in fear lest such a fate
My dear, brave boy should meet,
And the tidings from that little bird
With love and joy I greet.

ADELAIDE RANDALL.

The Fox and the Rabbit.

"I swear," said a fox to a rabbit one day—
'Tis a story they often relate in the South—
"You shall be, Mr. Rabbit, ere sunset my prey!"
And he threatened him fiercely with wide-open mouth.

The rabbit set off at the top of his speed,
Resolving by flight to get out of the scrape;
But, hotly pursued, soon discovered the need
Of adopting a trick to effect his escape.

So he ran to a well-curb which chanced to be nigh,
A windlass that two spacious buckets possessed,
And leaping in one—both were empty and dry—
Very quick at the bottom found safety and rest.

As one of the buckets thus suddenly fell,
The other and lighter rose equally fast;
And when Reynard arrived at the top of the well
He thought to himself, "I hav got you at last!"

"My friend, why didn't you take them both with you?"
Said the fox, as he bowed to the one that now swung
So high and inviting; "this nonsense we'll end;"
And into the bucket exulting he sprung.

You see his mistake; for his heavier weight
To the surface the rabbit full speedily drew,
Who said, while ascending, "Life's changes are great;
Now up and now down! Mr. Reynard, adieu!"

Then off hopped the rabbit, and lived, I suppose,
Esteemed by his friends, to a happy old age;
While the fox, when the day came at last to a close,
Was caught by a farmer and put in a cage.

Now all of this proves what has often been said
Of the slips that occur 'twixt the lip and the cup;
So if up do not boast, there are hazards ahead;
If down, don't lose courage, you soon may be up!

—Philip Burroughs Strong in Wide Awake.

Sensible.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON AND CHILDREN OF THE CHILDREN'S CORNER: Would you like to know how I spent the Fourth of July? I'll tell you my way of celebrating, as some of the boys and girls might like to hear. For several years I hav invited the newsboys of my town (Stoneham, Mass.) to take breakfast with me on that morning. This year my type-written invitations were issued on Japanese napkins in this form:

TO THE NEWSBOYS: Fourth of July greeting. You are cordially invited to an independent lunch, from 7 to 11 A.M., with your friend, C. FANNIE ALLYN.

I had a dear little maiden to assist me. She had a red, white, and blue cap on her head, and a little flag on her left shoulder. I told you of her in rhyme like this once:

Gipsy Queen I call my Bessie,
With her eyes so dark and bright.

I couldn't afford luxuries, so we had coffee, bread and butter, cookies, salmon, potted chicken and ham, cake, and ice cream. Each boy found in his plate a bunch of firecrackers, a tin horn, a Roman candle, and a motto. The mottoes were, "Forget not the Brave," "Be True to Your Country," with others of that nature. After breakfast the boys came to the parlor, and presented their mottoes in exchange for a packet bearing a duplicate motto. The packages contained baseballs, neckties, games, pocket-books, and a variety of articles that I thought would please boys. The boys came, and ate, and laughed, and talked, and there was no impatience of word or deed to mar the morning. We just had a "splendid time." I did, anyway. As my house had tenants I took the rooms of my Methodist neighbor (I think I hav got as good neighbors as anyone in this world, though none of them are Freethinkers, but I just love them all). And I had a dear old lady of almost ninety with us that July morning, and she enjoyed it as much as the rest of us. One of the boys (Harry Keene) brought me a bouquet, which made me so pleased that I havn't got through smiling yet. And two days before, when I gave a little boy some money for doing an errand, the blessed child brought it back, saying, "Aunt Fannie, it will cost you so much for the Fourth that you had best keep this toward it." Wasn't that good in a little fellow? Of course I didn't take it, but he did another errand, and I put the pennies for it in the little gifts.

Now, children, let me tell you why I do this. Once I had a boy of my own, and ten years ago he left me for the infinit beyond. When Christians sometimes say to me, "How can you bear this trouble if you hav no savior to flee to?" then I answer: By trying to make some other boy or girl a little happier, and doing by them as I would hav liked some one to do for mine. There is so little one with limited means can do, and life on earth is so brief, that if one does not take the opportunities they miss a good deal. And all of us do miss doing much that might make the world happier. But I think the world is growing better every year. I think that Miss Wixon and the Children's Corner will help "the good time coming." But I imagin dear Miss Wixon is shaking her finger at me, and saying, "Talk less and say more." So, with love to all the boys and girls, I'll say good-night.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

Stoneham, Mass., July, 1890.

[Everyone must agree that Mrs. Allyn's method of celebrating the Fourth of July is a beautiful and useful one. Mr. J. Waters recommends the anniversary of our national independence as a gift season, instead of the 25th of December, which is of far less significance than our national holiday. This eventful day is full of importance, and should be observed in a rational and sensible manner. To celebrate it in some such manner as above is most worthy. We join with the newsboys of Stoneham in saying, "Long liv C. Fannie Allyn." Her heart is large, loving, and true. She is one of the rare women who make the world better by love and good works.—ED. C. C.]

Her Little Brother's Bet.

Little Tommy was entertaining one of his sister's admirers until she appeared.

"Don't you come to see my sister?" he inquired.

"Yes, Tommy, that's what I come for."

"You like her immensely, don't you?"

"Of course I admire her very much. Don't you think she's nice?"

"Well, I hav to, 'cause she's my sister; but she thumps me pretty hard sometimes. But let's see you open your mouth once. Now shut it tight till I count ten. There—I knowed you could do it!"

"Why, Tommy, who said I couldn't?"

"Oh, nobody but sister."

"What did she say?"

"Well, she said you hadn't sense enough to keep your mouth shut, and I bet her two big apples you had; and you hav, havn't you? And you'll make her stump up the apples, won't you?"

The young man did not wait to see whether she would "stump up" or not.

Correspondence.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., July 13, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It has been a long time since I hav written to the Corner, and as you were kind enough to print my other letter I thought I would try it again. I am very much interested in the Corner, and love to read the letters and other matter also. We had a very nice rain here Saturday, and we were very glad to see it, for we needed it badly. We hav had a dry spell of weather. It is very warm weather here now.

I think the pictures are grandly designed. It is nice for the writers of the Corner to correspond with one another. I correspond with some little ladies of the Corner, and would like some more to correspond with.

I like to write to them because I can learn from them about the climate, inhabitants, and productions of the places they liv in. It seems rather queer when they talk of it being so hot when it is rather cold here. I guess I will close for the time. I will try to write a longer and better letter next time. Hoping to see this in print, I remain,

Your Liberal friend, LIZZIE KEINNAM.

GRANT FORK, ILL., July 28, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written to your great and noble paper for a very long time but still I read the letters in the Corner from the young friends. I don't see as many letters in the Corner as I did when we first subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope it is not going down. I am thirteen years old. I was thirteen the 16th of this month. I had five pets but now only four. One died, which was a young fox with black legs. He got loose three or four times but did not run off. He committed suicide by hanging himself. He was very tame. My young goat is also very tame. I named him "Billy." Well, Billy is a regular bucker from Buckhorn land. He is a great pet to the whole town. He has done no mischief yet, only broken one of our neighbor's jars and pulled up all the young rose bushes in their yard. I hav a pair of red birds whose names are Punch and Judy, also a young canary. I would like to correspond with some of the young Freethinkers. Hoping to receive some letters, I will close and remain,

Yours in Freethought, JOHN KRAFT.

How Beads are Made.

It sounds almost incredible, yet it is, however, a stated fact that it takes many carloads of glass beads annually to supply the demand of the purchasers.

The best customers are the French, and next the Spanish of this country and Europe. According to the testimony of a German whose name I hav forgotten, the purer the nation the less the fondness for beads.

It is presumably evident that the Germans as a nation are too earnest and industrious to care for such frivolous vanities. Almost the sole costume of the Hindoo, Malay, and Ethiopian consists of those ornaments, and in Africa they are frequently used in the place of money.

The Mongolians and Japanese are purchasers of that ornament (beads), but the Chinese are said to detest beads of all sorts. The Italians do not share the love of beads, but strangely enough it is from Venice that the civilized and uncivilized people are supplied. Beads are mostly manufactured at Venice, and the seven large bead factories there and on a neighboring island belong to a German who employs five hundred hands.

In all, about six thousand earn their living by different processes incidental to bead-making and a poor living it is said to be, too.

The process is very simple, and we will all see for ourselvs, should we ever enjoy the privilege of a visit to Italy and the Venetian city.

Beads are made of different materials, as pearl, steel, amber, garnet, glass, coral, diamond, rock-crystal, and seeds.

The Roman Catholics find them indispensable in rehearsing their Ave Marias and their Pater Nosters, and a string of such beads is called a rosary. Just imagin, what would an Ave be worth without a rosary?

But to resume the subject, and check the pen that is inclined to ramble on others of less importance. The chief essential of bead-making is that the glass, which is worked when in a semi-fluid state, should be tough and ductil, so that it can be drawn out like rosin, only very much thinner.

Before the glass leaves the furnace it is colored by chemicals, of which arsenic, saltpeter, and antimony are the principal.

It is then ready to be drawn out into tubes. A glass-blower dips his iron rod into the sticky mass, then takes up a lump the size of an apple and rolls it on a plate to round it, then taking a simple tool makes a hollow at the end of the ball like that at the end of a wine bottle. Another workman has done the same with another lump, and the two then press the hollowed edges of the balls together until they adhere, and the union is so complete that the air within cannot escape. The workmen then walk with their rods, in opposit directions, to a distance of a hundred yards, keeping step all the time exactly, as if they were marching. Meanwhile the red-hot glass stretches off from the balls as long as any remains, or perhaps until it becomes cool. At the same time the inclosed air pushes itself out of the long glass thread, and so produces a hollow tube instead of a solid rod of glass, and the future bead has now received its necessary hole.

These tubes may be of various sizes, and so making different-sized beads.

A very general home industry at Venice is the sorting of the tubes, and the breaking of them into about three-feet lengths, making the large basketfuls look like the quills of a porcupine. The girls and women sort and weigh these, and then take them back to the factories, and put them into machines exactly like our straw-cutting machines, into which we dare not hold our fingers, for fear they will come out much shorter than they went in.

There the tubes are chopped into the required size. Then to make them smooth, and to prevent the hole from closing, they are mixed with fine sand and heated in cylinders, kept revolving in the furnace. Then they are sieved to sort them according to their size, and those that are desired to hav an extra polish are put into bags of bran and shaken. Then they are strung in chains, or skeins, which is another home industry.

It is said the Venetian woman, whose work it is, holds as many as a dozen steel needles a foot in length, and often as fine as a silk thread, between her fingers; these she thrusts into the heap, getting as many as she can hap-hazard.

Of course the costlier and finer beads are made separately, and bring a good price, and are more effectiv and ornamental than the commoner kind. A. H. STOCKINGER.

Literary Notice.

The August number of that excellent publication, the Popular Science Monthly, opens with an extended article by Edward Atkinson entitled, "Common Sense applied to the Tariff Question." It is a discussion of the business principles which should govern our tariff revision, and, as common sense has been quite rare in this connection, the article should be very welcome. One year ago a small army was at work cleansing and rebuilding the houses and caring for the inhabitants of the desolated Johnstown region. Dr. G. G. Groff, president of the Pennsylvania state board of health, contributes to the monthly some of the experience that he gained in this task, in an article on "Sanitary Work in Great Disasters." An account of one of the most interesting features in the relations of the Europeans to the American Indians is given by Henry W. Henshaw in a copiously illustrated paper on "Missions and Mission Indians of California," from which we make extracts on another page. A curious lot of beliefs about future punishment has been put together by Frederik A. Fernald, under the title, "Ancient and Modern Ideas of Hell." President David Starr Jordan concludes his essay on "Evolution and the Distribution of Animals" in this number. There is an illustrated paper by Bernhard Hollander, of London, on "Centers of Ideation in the Brain," showing how the experiments of modern physiologists support some of the observations of the early phrenologists. Under the title, "A Queer Pet," Miss E. W. Bellamy describes the doings of a praying mantis, or devil's riding-horse. Edward B. Poulton writes on "The Uses of Animal Color;" a note of warning is given by M. Charles Richet on the subject of "Mental Strain;" and Dr. Klein tells of recent progress in "The Discovery of Invisible Worlds." A very timely article is that on "Thunder-Storms," by Robert H. Scott. There are a sketch and portrait of Rudolph Koenig, a celebrated inventor of scientific instruments. In the Editor's Table, "Mr. Herbert Spencer's Place in Philosophy" is discussed; and the Miscellany departmen is well filled.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

STANLEY is in fair health again.

ITALIAN and negro laborers hav come into conflict at Pomona, N. J.

CATHOLICS are crying out against the "rampancy of Freemasonry" in Uruguay.

THE Chicago city council has resolved to fill 150 acres of the lake front as a fair site.

A TELESCOPE lens, larger even than the Lick, and able to make the moon appear only 100 miles away, is proposed.

NEW YORK and the neighboring country is suffering from a spell of heat that causes several deaths and many prostrations daily.

RACE hatred has caused a French physician to protest against any of his countrymen taking part in the Berlin Medical Congress.

To combat Socialists, the authorities of Catalonia, Spain, hav declared a state of siege, and directed the arrest of the ringleaders.

THERE passed over Chicago a few days ago a meteor looking like a ball of fire, carrying a broad trail of fire, and emitting a hissing sound.

JAY GOULD has given a present, or bribe, of land worth $9,000 to the Episcopal and Presbyterian churches of Irvington-on-the-Hudson.

THERE is trouble at a New York G. A. R. post over the rejection of a member's dues because two years ago, in Savannah, he praised Jefferson Davis.

AMONG the states whose confederation makes up the German empire, there is jealousy at the excessiv influence of the chief one of them, Prussia.

GUATEMALA and San Salvador are making desperate efforts against each other. The former has 40,000 men under arms at present; the latter. 10,000.

DURING the Columbian Exposition there will be held at Chicago a congress of social reformers of every description, who will expound their doctrins.

CANADIANS hav long stolen lumber from the northern border of Minnesota, and the federal government has dispatched an expedition to suppress the practice.

MARSH COOK, a Republican of Marsh county, Miss., said that he would stand as a candidate if the federal election bill passed, and was shot from ambush and killed.

CHINA is spending this year about $5,000,000 in the effort to regulate its wayward river, the Hoang Ho, which has recently caused such terrible loss of life and property.

THE Prison Association of New York meets with success in securing places so that ex-convicts who desire to liv honestly may do so; 1,600 hav secured places during the past year.

ELLEN SWANTON, a sister in the Sacred Heart Convent in New York, has been taken to the city hospital, having developed religious insanity, imagining that she had a mission to convert everyone.

A THEOLOGICAL bickering that has long continued between a Jewish rabbi of Milwaukee and an elder has been settled by the pulling out of part of the rabbi's beard and the arraignment of the parties in court.

BLAINE'S proposal of free trade with American nations causes rival Republican leaders to denounce him as an apostate to protection. There is jealousy between Blaine, Reed, and McKinley, all probably aspiring to the presidential nomination.

THE government of the Argentine Republic has suppressed the rebellion. An amnesty has been granted to the offenders. It appears that the rebel cause was the just one, as the government had been foully corrupt. The insurgents failed only from a blunder in not securing sufficient ammunition.

THE farmers of Ottawa and Cloud counties, Kan., are more vehement against capitalists than those of any other part of the West. Since April, when many of them resolved in mass meeting to refuse, after December 1st, all taxes, coupon interest. or mortgage indebtedness unless helped to the money by government, they hav maintained an energetic agitation.

Gems of Thought.

TRUE, a man cannot lift himself by his own waistbands, because he cannot get out of himself; but he can expand himself (which is better, there being no up nor down in nature), and so split his waistbands, being already within himself.—Thoreau.

PLUNGE we in time's tempestuous flow,
Stem we the rolling surge of chance!
There may alternate weal and woe,
Success and failure, as they can,
Mingle and shift in changeful dance!
Excitement is the sphere for man. . . .
The scope of all my powers henceforth be this,
To bare my breast to every pang—to know
In my heart's core all human weal and woe,
To grasp in thought the lofty and the deep,
Men's various fortunes on my breast to heap,
And thus to theirs dilate my individual mind,
And share at length with them the shipwreck of mankind.—Goethe.

SEVERAL learned men hav testified their surprise at not finding in the historian Flavius Josephus, any mention of Jesus Christ; for all men of true learning are now agreed that the short passage relativ to him in that history has been interpolated. The father of Flavius Josephus must, however, hav been witness to all the miracles of Jesus. Josephus was of the sacerdotal race, and akin to Herod's wife, Mariamne. He givs us long details of all that prince's actions, yet says not a word of the life or death of Jesus, nor does this historian, who disguises none of Herod's cruelties, say one word of the general massacre of the infants, ordered by him on hearing that there was born a king of the Jews. The Greek calendar estimates the number of children murdered, on this occasion, at fourteen thousand. This is, of all actions of all tyrants, the most horrible. There is no example of it in the history of the whole world. Yet the best writer the Jews hav ever had, the only one esteemed by the Greeks and Romans, makes no mention of an event so singular and so frightful. He says nothing of the appearance of a new star in the east, after the birth of our savior—a brilliant phenomenon, which could not escape the knowledge of an historian so enlightened as Josephus. He is also silent respecting the darkness which, on our savior's death, covered the whole earth for three hours at midday, the great number of graves that opened at that moment, and the multitude of the just that rose again. The learned are constantly evincing their surprise that no Roman historian speaks of these prodigies, happening in the empire of Tiberius, under the eyes of a Roman governor and a Roman garrison, who must hav sent to the emperor and the senate a detailed account of the most miraculous event that mankind had ever heard of. Rome itself must hav been plunged for three hours in impenetrable darkness. Such a prodigy would hav had a place in the annals of Rome, and in those of every nation.—Voltaire.

WE know nothing certainly of Jesus Christ. We know nothing of his infancy, nothing of his youth, and we are not sure that such a person ever existed.—Ingersoll.

THE teaching of the early fathers on the subject is perfectly unanimous and unequivocal. Without a single exception, all who touched upon the subject pronounced activ resistance to the established authorities to be under all circumstances sinful. If the law enjoined what was wrong, it should be disobeyed, but no vice and no tyranny could justify revolt.—Lecky.

THE right of resistance ought never to be entirely erased from the mind of man, because by its abolition he puts on the fetters of servitude. The notion of the right of resistance had been banished from the Roman community, by the general disgrace and infamy into which it had fallen, and it could not be regenerated from its ruins. It could not, in my opinion, hav sprung more naturally from the principles of Christian society. It is to the feudal system that we are indebted for its reintroduction among us.—Guizot's History of Civilization.

INJUSTICE is not easily supported. The strong may gain despotic power for a time, but the crafty only can maintain and strengthen it. No monarchy nor aristocracy can long subsist by open force, but only by specious deception. The few cannot tread on the necks of the many, unless they first blind their eyes. And never was a bandage found that blindfolds so effectually, or so conveniently, as the bandage of religion. Through its thick, mysterious folds, scarce a ray of reason's light can penetrate, and thus the political juggler can play off his legerdemain tricks without fear of challenge or detection. . . . Run your eyes over the pages of history, and say if church and state hav not been inseparable allies. Say if the sword has not planted the cross, only that the cross might sanctify the sword. Look to England, look to France, look over the civilized world. . . . Call to mind the French Revolution. What gave the death-blow to despotic power and aristocratic sway, in that great struggle for reason and freedom! Was it not the fall of the beneficed priest, and the loss of his influence? And who reëstablished that influence? Was it not the autocrat Napoleon?—Robt. Dale Owen.

Notes and Clippings.

THE quickest trip ever made around the earth was made some years ago by the short-winded preacher who prayed around the world and back again in four hours.

IT is reported that Cardinal Rampolla has by circular instructed the Italian bishops to inaugurate an agitation against Premier Crispi's proposed laws regulating the city of Rome.

THERE is a conflict now going on at Belgrade, Servia, between the government and the synod of bishops regarding the appointment of a new bishop. In consequence of the dispute the minister of public worship threatens to resign.

THE Russian minister of the interior has ordered the local authorities to prevent foreign missionaries from carrying on their religious propaganda among the Jews to the detriment of the exclusiv right of conversion possessed by the Orthodox church.

THE New United States of Brazil, like that of Switzerland, imitates our republic closely. The federal capitol, however, unlike the District of Columbia, will hav the right to representation in the senate and house, and to choose presidential electors. The terms of senators will be nine, and that of the president six years.

CHURCH ushers in Boston hav apparently got the business down pretty fine. One of them the other Sunday remarked to a pretty woman who had asked him for a seat: "If you will allow me, madam, I should like to giv you a seat on the broad aisle. We put the handsomest ones there to decorate the church."

THE military draft in Italy in 1888 consisted of 162,326. Of this number 89,602 could read and write, 2,954 could only read, and 69,770 could neither read nor write. Comparing this proportion of educated men with that of the draft of 1885, the general state of education in Italy has advanced by 3.39 per cent within the last three years. If this progress is continued for the next forty years, there will be not a man in that country without being able to read and to write.

THE prices previously obtained for school-books afforded a reasonable profit. But a trust has been formed by the leading publishing houses of A. S. Barnes & Co., D. Appleton & Co., Irwin, Blakeman & Co., Van Antwerp, Bragg & Co., and Harper Bros., together with enough smaller concerns to represent 90 per cent of that branch of business. Competition will be eliminated, and as a result, school-books will become cheaper in quality and dearer in price. This recent addition to the trust family is labeled the American Book Company, with headquarters at Philadelphia.

THE republic of Equador is governed by priests. No book can be imported without approval from the Jesuits. The national receipts and expenditures are never published. The people know as little about public funds as the Roman laymen of America know about their own parish finances. Quito, the capital, with two hundred thousand people, is just as it was three hundred years ago. No railroads or telegraphs are allowed, and there are no schools except the few taught by monks, where beads take the place of reading. Four-fifths of the people can neither read nor write.

THE Roman Catholics of Neponset, Ward 24, Boston, are to hold a fair some time during the month, for which they are making great preparations. A few days ago one of the communicants of this church called upon a provision dealer on Beach street, Boston, and requested, as he had traded there occasionally, that he would make a contribution toward the church building fund. The dealer said that he did not feel able, having had his entire family sick for some time, and being a member of a Baptist church he felt that he ought to put all he could spare into his own church. The beggar said, as he stepped out of the door, "I will see to your trade in Neponset."—British American.

IN discussing the Indian appropriation bill in the Senate, Mr. Reagan declared himself opposed to any connection between church and state, and to all denominational schools. He would hav all the Indian schools carried on under the control of the United States government. As to the argument that the work could be done cheaper and better by religious denominations, he said that if that argument were to prevail it would apply equally well to the common schools of the country. That was an admission which ought not to be made. Senator George indorsed fully the position taken by the Senator from Texas. These two were alone in their secular opinions.

THE committee appointed by Right Rev. Bishop Whitaker to make inquiry relativ to the charges affecting the conduct of Rev. C. S. Daniel, minister in charge of St. Chrysostom's Protestant Episcopal church, Philadelphia, hav concluded their labors, and hav submitted a report recommending that Mr. Daniel be presented for trial for a misappropriation of funds and for a breach of his ordination vows. According to the report of the committee, Mr. Daniel assumed charge of St. Chrysostom's church in June, 1880, and the total contributions for work among the poor and for current expenses received by him was $21,088.91, and of this, it is alleged, he appropriated to his own use upward of $16,000.

WHAT is the cause of this disease—this Sunday sickness, the characteristic symptom of which is an indisposition to go to church? Why is it that "church-goers," by which is meant those who consider it a duty to go to church and who go sometimes, do not like to go to church? Why is it not a pleasure for them to go to church? Are they bored at church, and if so, why? Is it because they are thoroughly bad and cannot endure to sit under righteous and goodly teachings? Or is it because the pulpit does not supply what they need? It seems to us that if the description of the disease is correct, it would pay to study all the causes. If the pulpit teaches just what should be taught and in the right way, then there is something very wrong with church people who do not go to church, and yet they seem like honest and conscientious and dutiful people in the ordinary walks of life. If man is essentially religious and religion givs the highest joy, it does not seem reasonable that he should turn from its teaching if it is taught according to his need. Perhaps the fault lies in the teaching.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

THE Farmers' Alliance, North and South, seems likely to hav some considerable influence in the autumn elections. Its aims, so far as they hav been formulated, include the following: 1. The Sub-treasury bill so called, being a project for the government to take farm products on storage and advance legal tender notes on the same to the producers. This is the prevailing Alliance purpose in the South. 2. Abolition of the Supreme Court, abolition of laws for the collection of debts, the seizure of railroad property in behalf of the people, and the revaluation of mortgages. In Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Texas the farmers, under one of the several designations by which they are known, are very activ. The farmers of the Eastern and Middle states hav not, as in other states, taken up the agitation. The Alliance has hardly obtained a foothold in New York or in Pennsylvania. The only state in New England where it has made headway is Connecticut. In the Western states, however, the movement is widespread and earnest. Here, as in the South, it was non-political at first, even the discussion of political questions having been prohibited. But this restriction has now been removed, and with it has come a contest for political supremacy.

THE Newburyport, Mass., Herald recently printed an interview with a Spiritualist, in which he says: "A short time ago Walter E Reid, of Grand Rapids, Mich., was arrested on the charge of falsely using the mails. Reid is known as a medium for reading sealed letters; that is, he professes to be able to obtain from spirits answers to sealed inquiries addressed to the latter. The prosecutor was the postmaster-general. Judge Jackson instructed the jury to find Reid guilty of fraud. Reid protested his innocence and offered to prove that he was innocent by reading sealed letters then and there in open court. Judge Jackson said that Reid's offer to do what he (Jackson) knew he could not do proved to his mind that Reid must be a fraud. He accordingly sentenced him to prison. Spiritualists think, waiving altogether the question of whether Reid is a fraud or not, that Judge Jackson's action will be construed to establish a precedent against mediumship, and that it is a blow against personal liberty. President Harrison will be asked to pardon Reid, and if he refuses to do so, as it is intimated he will, the one million Spiritualistic voters of America will vote against Harrison and his party in 1892."

THE New York Sun says: "Modern Infidelity, by far the most radical form of Infidelity in the history of the Christian church, treats faith as nothing more than superstition resting on the imagination, and a blind acceptance of traditional authority incapable of scientific demonstration. It acknowledges the religious instinct, as it must do, but treats it as an expression of the weakness of man groping after an explanation of the unexplainable mysteries of life, not as a capacity to perceive the final truth by divine grace. Theology and mythology are classed together by this Infidelity as the creations of man and not of a supreme intelligence. It rejects inspiration at the start, for it rejects all supernaturalism as undemonstrable, and without revelation upon which to rest, what becomes of theology? It goes further and strikes at the very foundation of religion by refusing to accept the personality of God, as beyond the power of man to know and to prove. The substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen, as St. Paul defines faith, are altogether outside of the facts of demonstration to which it confines belief. Accordingly, there is no possibility of argument between theology and this modern and scientific Infidelity, for they can agree on no fundamental propositions. In its view all the gods of men, savage and civilized, Christian and pagan, are man-made idols only."

THE outrages committed by the White Caps of Indiana hav been most shocking. In an official report made by the attorney-general of the state he said, speaking particularly of Crawford county: "They hav repeatedly flogged helpless women until life was nearly extinct." He made the further almost incredible statement that they "hav procured the publication of their law-defying notices in the newspapers of the county." Worse still, he declared that "good citizens openly applaud the doings of the White Caps." He showed that property had depreciated in value there, "since no one has that confidence in his neighbor which is essential to a good state of society." And all this, he said, had then, in 1888, been going on for two years. The situation is quite as bad in 1890 as it was in 1888. The Indianapolis News declares that White Cappism "flourishes to-day as it never did before," and it draws this really startling picture of the situation: "Judging from its course, this infernal barbarity has become a factor in life. Local opinion seems to reckon it as an influence, just as the 'saloon influence,' the 'temperance element,' and such forces are reckoned, or as the vigilantes, or society for the suppression of horse-thieves, are part of the life of frontier civilization. Actually, in parts of this great, rich, enlightened state the due course of law and order is a farce. A man's life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness is at the mercy of bands of wretches on a level with the brigands of Italy, or the outlying tribes of Arabia."

THE Protestants and Catholics of Clearfield, Pa., are engaged in a bitter sectarian fight. The Protestants are mostly organized in the patriotic order of the Sons of America, and a British- and Scottish-American association. Both are bitterly opposed to Catholics. They hav been working together politically in the town of Houtzdale. Houtzdale has been strongly Catholic and Democratic, but at the last municipal election the Protestants, through their work at the polls, defeated all the Catholic Democrats and Republicans, and elected a citizen's ticket composed exclusivly of Protestants. This greatly angered the Catholics. White Hixon, editor of the Houtzdale Observer, for attacking the Catholics in his paper, was threatened with death, and always went armed. He was attacked one night, but upon displaying a revolver he was allowed to go. Hixon entered suit against all his assailants, and they are now under bonds awaiting trial. At a recent horserace a free fight between the opposit sides was precipitated by Matt Savage, one of the Catholic leaders, and a prominent man, villifying the Protestants, because a Protestant constable was about to remove him from the track where he had no business. Savage and the other Catholics who were in the riot were arrested and held for court. It looks as if the presence of the militia will be necessary to prevent bloodshed when the case comes to trial. It is charged that at a recent funeral a Catholic priest, instead of preaching a sermon, directed a tirade against the Protestant relations of the deceased who were present, and knocked the hat of one off because it was put on before the wearer got clear outside of the church.

WALTER POLLARD, of the Pollard Publishing Company, was at the Tombs police court on the 8th to testify that there was nothing immoral in Tolstoi's "Kreutzer Sonata," for selling which Capt. McLaughlin had arrested four street venders on Wednesday. Justice White said that he did not think there was anything in the book that was likely to hurt anyone's morals; but that the signs displayed by the venders that the book had been suppressed by the czar of Russia and the postmaster-general of the United States should be destroyed, as they were meant to insinuate that there was something shocking in the book. He discharged all the prisoners and the seized copies of the book were returned to them. Assistant District Attorney Bedford spent a part of the same afternoon reading the "Kreutzer Sonata" and other books that hav been seized recently. At the close of the examination he said to a reporter: "I think the arrests of those concerned in selling such works should be made by the proper authorities only. I don't believe in these societies setting themselvs up as censors and constituting themselvs judges and jury in the matter. If I don't find anything more in the case I shall do nothing about it." Dr. Gunn's man Britton failed to appear before the excise board to press the charge of violating the excise law which he had made against Koster & Bial. The complaint was therefore dismissed. Concert Garden Keepers Hermann and Peters received their concert licenses from Mayor Grant. They were among the proprietors whom the amateurs in vice repression Gunn and Britton made charges against. The amateurs said that they had no complaint to make against the character of the places or of those who frequented them, but that they had evidence of violations of the excise law in them. The mayor held that this was a matter for the excise commissioners and police magistrates to consider.

Communications.

Our "Holy" Faith.

The popular, modern meaning religious people attach to this word holy, has a wonderful influence in keeping them in the dark and in spiritual bondage. We must examin into the root and origin of the word and learn what it meant to those of earlier times, who used it in connection with their religious thoughts and teachings. We will find it was not understood in the present sense, but with altogether a different meaning from that we ascribe to it now. Because we read the ancient writings not with the sense and meaning in which they were written, we cannot understand them. With our new definitions to the words, is it anything remarkable that we should not agree or should not understand what the ancients hav written? This assumption on the part of religious teachers to enter the field of philology and change the etymology of the language has led to controversy, quarrels, and sectarian bitterness.

The definitions and interpretations of the Bible imposed upon us to day are not those of the writers of that book. There are many important, leading words prominent for the significance they giv to the text, that hav undergone a complete transformation in meaning, through the arbitrary and bigoted zeal of the church to make a religion that would support the superstitious beliefs of a dark and idolatrous age.

The word "holy" is one of them. If we will examin a lexicon or an English dictionary we will see at once that we hav all been deceived, and hav been taught to believe what is false and what the fathers never meant to teach; and that we hav never understood the lessons they taught and intended to leave on record.

The word "holy" did not mean anything sacred or divine; it did not refer to anything supernatural or superhuman. Then any common thing, almost any material or physical object, was called holy; not because it possessed any inherent divine properties. It was called holy because of a special or peculiar use made of it, or from association or connection with certain priestly acts or duties.

There was nothing in the word itself—no virtue, no significance; it was an adjectiv to designate uses, to which objects, places, persons, or things were put or applied.

Anything which was used for religious purposes was designated from the other things that were not so used by the word "holy." It was simply a word used for the purpose of separating everything that was connected with priestly services in any way, from things that were purely secular or had nothing to do with religion. A thing in ancient times was not necessarily any better because it was holy, for the adjectiv was applied to things that were good or bad or indifferent, and to very many things that had no moral qualities about them.

Just as we use the adjectiv black—a black thing may be good or bad.

Besides Holy Ghost, holy spirit, and holy scriptures, we hav holy temple, holy water, holy mountain, Holy Land, holy war, holy ground, holy sepulcher, holy cross, holy Sabbath, holy Inquisition, and many more holy things. Now, we know there is nothing inherent in these things that makes them different or better or worse than there is in the same things elsewhere, that are not called "holy." There are any amount of ghosts and spirits and scriptures in these times that are "holy" in the same sense the ancients believed and called things holy, but to which we do not apply the word. Because we do not think the word applicable to them, although more deserving, or because they are modern and human, and do not belong to ancient and holy times.

By the church during the Dark Ages, when not one in ten thousand could read—including many of the clergy—when light and intelligence were almost blotted out of existence, and the people had no guide but their low animal instincts; when science, law, literature, and civil government itself were suppressed or brought in subjection to the benighted and corrupt church; then these changes in the use of the word "holy" began. The understandings of the people had become so feeble, debased, and corrupted, they had not the capacity to discriminate nor to appreciate, so they accepted the Bible language, including this word holy, just as the darkened priesthood imposed it upon them.

It was during this dark period of the church history that so many things became holy that were never called holy before—holy in the sense that we now hav them—because the priests taught the people they were so. They had their holy pilgrimages and crusades—his "holiness" the pope and his holy saints, who conducted the holy wars, were generally holy men that were bestial, licentious, and corrupt; men whose moral sense was so low and obtuse that it did not restrain them from any means within their reach to accomplish their unscrupulous, malignant, or ambitious purposes in enslaving and degrading the people into abject subserviency to their own despotic wills.

If we will examin, we will find that the theology of the Dark Ages has given us our religion.

Much of the superstition we cherish, and our reverence for holy things, for the holy mysteries and miraculous occurrences recorded in our "holy scriptures," originated in that bigoted, barbaric, and bloody period. It is well known by all intelligent clergymen and biblical scholars, and openly avowed by the revising committee in their "Companion to the New Testament," that not only new and wrong meanings hav been given to many words, but that great changes in the text hav been made, by additions and omissions, by the Roman clergy; so much as to change and often to destroy entirely the original sense.

There were none of these holy things known nor spoken of in the days of Jesus and his apostles.

They did not know that Judea was a holy land; or that Olivet was a holy mountain; or that a simple sepulcher, a hole chiseled in a stone, could be holy; nor that a gibbet in the form of a crucifix was holy.

Neither did Jesus say or think anything about a "holy spirit," nor did Paul. The context of their homilies would not admit of it, without a ridiculous and absurd use of words, destroying the good sense.

With them, it was simply the spirit, in opposition or contrast to the letter, or the law. It was the living up to the principle; living right, because it was right, and best, per se, and not living or doing right merely because the letter or the law required it of the believer.

So we see they had no use for the word holy; to them it would hav been worse than superfluous. It would hav weakened if not destroyed the sense; and shown a lack of manly dignity and common intelligence.

No; no; no! Wherever we find the word holy used in language attributed to Jesus or Paul, or any other of the earlier writers, we may be assured that it was put there by later scribes and copyists, by the orders of the church, after the third century, when the church began to reverence relics, reminiscences, and material objects from Jerusalem more than the lessons of truth and light and love, which characterized all of the real teachings of Jesus. When virtue declined, then show and sound and pretense of extra godliness took the place of that reality, which had become paganized and lost in superstition.

There are no gospels in existence now that were written earlier than the fifth century, and no one knows how accurately or erroneously they hav been copied. Vast numbers and quantities of the earlier and purer manuscripts of the original writers were destroyed by the authority of the Roman church.

Many of these were more rational and simple, and easily understood. They were destroyed on that account. If they had been preserved and read, the people would hav gained from them such rational, intelligent views of religion, that they would not hav submitted so readily to the domination of the priesthood.

They would hav resisted the changes in the text and meaning of words that the clergy unscrupulously made and which Christendom so humbly accepts.

The revisers of the New Testament knew these facts in regard to the text, but they pledged the public that they would not alter them materially, before they began their task. Merely changes of grammar and a slight improvement in the style and the substituting of some milder and less offensiv words where needed, was about all they promised or expected to do in this undertaking to improve our ancient religious literature.

They knew the masses reverenced the text and its teachings so much, notwithstanding the many perversions and corruptions they contained, that the infatuated and credulous multitude would not accept the version if the falsehoods and interpolations were expunged and any considerable changes were made to restore them nearer to the original.

The flood of light that modern scholarship is throwing on the corruptions and abuses of these ancient scripture records is doing but little to correct the false notions and impressions of religion the people entertain. False, misleading, and mischievous as are the influences, as much as they are deceived and suffer from the delusion, they would sooner adhere to their errors and do what they can to perpetuate them by persistently teaching them and opposing those who teach the truth concerning the facts and are laboring to correct the errors. Such is the fondness for and attachment to tradition, the reverence and devotion for ancient, sanctified myths and long-cherished beliefs and usages, that they possess a charm over the religious emotions and affections that nothing in heaven or earth can break. Yes, so it is!

The church lapsed into this debasement, this lack of principle and disregard of integrity, during the time it opposed thought, when it believed that learning and intellectual strength, investigation and criticism, were of the devil. It was then the pope, bishops, priests, and saints had their divine revelations, their teachings direct from God, and they would not tolerate any human judgment to interfere with their stupid, irrational, and often immoral and inhuman decisions and decrees, which they claimed were infallible revelations of the divine will. These revelations authorized them to change the meaning of words and to reconstruct the scriptures so as to make them to sanction these newer but baser ideas of God and religion.

The greater reformers that hav appeared at different periods of the church history saw and knew these abuses were being perpetrated. Some of them—Luther particularly distinguished himself—protested against them. But the evils were so old, deep-rooted, and universal, they seemed to be in the general estimation sanctioned and sanctified.

The corruptions and changes in the scripture were allowed to remain to a great extent, for with them in the record they found enough that was genuin to quote against the existing gross sensualities and the assumptions of the church. On the testimony of these scriptures was their chief dependence for the authority to attack these corruptions and usurpations of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. With all their errors the scriptures were needed as the weapons of defense. Luther's, and other Protestant translations, were slight improvements on the Catholic version. No determined effort or disposition was manifested to restore them to their earlier simplicity. The times were inauspicious and the means were not at hand if the necessity had been ever so obvious and apparent. So it was postponed, and no translator or reviser since has had the courage or has succeeded in any thorough revision of the text. Our recognized King James's version and the modern "revision" are little else than reproductions of the old Catholic interpolated, abbreviated, and paganized version. The masses of the religious people among Protestants, priests, preachers, officers, and laymen hav been taught that it is "holy," and they blindly accept it as such on slight testimony. They want to believe it is so.

Notwithstanding these undeniable and indisputable truths and the testimony of the highest biblical scholarship to sustain them, pious people, religious teachers in all sects and denominations, oppose investigation or any better knowledge on the subject. Any attempt to correct the language or sense of the text but irritates and distresses them. They prefer these old Catholic and pagan superstitions and the mental and moral submission they hav wrought on their own minds and feelings to the freedom and cheerfulness of the light and truth. Deacons, elders, and church officers conspire to discountenance and suppress any inquiry calculated to undermine the divine authority of these "holy" scriptures, as we hav them prepared for us by the popish priests of the dark ages of stupid barbarism.

With the same priestly tones and gasping, ghastly facial solemnity, we must pronounce the word "h-o-l-y" with a reverent drawl, as the priests had learned to do in order to assume the airs and attitude of a superhuman being, and to command the veneration and homage of the benighted multitude.

Yes, all these ghostly sights and sounds of ecclesiastical pageantry were worked up by a debased and heathenish priesthood during the gloomy and barbarian period of nearly a thousand years, when the church lapsed into a religious despotism, subjugated the civil power, and had the exclusiv rule of the people.

It destroyed the Roman empire and introduced barbarism and anarchy. It bequeathed us the superstition now called orthodox Christianity.

These false ideas of the original meaning of the words "holy" and "holiness" we inherited from them, and we hav not the courage and manliness, not the honesty or ambition, to inquire or to care to know how we came in possession of our religious literature and of much of the superstitions we call our religion. They tell us it came from God; that is enough, we take their testimony. They say it was good enough for our ancestors, they believed it, it saved them, and it is good enough for us. We all admit the soundness of the ethical precepts, but it is not these that do the mischief. Nor is it these we war against. It is what is technically called the religion or the theology of the Bible, that enslaves the people and makes them cruel, superstitious, uncharitable, and despisers of the light and truth, which alone should be our guides.

In selecting this word "holy" for the present criticism it was not with a view of singling it out as especially exceptionable or obnoxious in the uses that hav been made of it. There are so many significant words that hav been changed so entirely in their meaning and uses since the Bible has been translated into English, that, to go no further back in our inquiry, we hav ample reason to submit the text to rigid criticism. Unless we "prefer darkness to light because our deeds are evil" it is our duty, and should be our pleasure, if we desire the right more than the wrong, to seek the truth and to welcome the assistance others can bring us to find it. If ignorant and misguided men hav deceived us and led us into gross errors and mistakes, it is no just excuse for us to remain there.

That we hav been so led is the concurrent testimony of all who hav taken the pains to examin and are qualified to hav a judgment on the question. If we hav justified ourselvs for refusing to take some portion of the record literally, what is to hinder us from looking into the whole text critically, and when we find it can be shown we are in error abandon the falsehoods we hav been taught to believe were sacred and infallible truths? Surrender the ridiculous habits and notions that we hav acquired and adopt the wiser and better course—the truth as far as we can find it, that it may make us free. We cannot succeed, neither do we deserve to, in obtaining and enjoying the good things in store for right living while we continue willfully in the wrong.

It is often urged by those who oppose inquiry, and rest in a false faith, that others engaged in the search of truth and exposing the false are wantonly, if not maliciously, tearing down and destroying, instead of sustaining and building up. This is the wail and the cry, the last resort and reason, of those clinging with faith and steadfastness to ancient error and illusion. It has been the cry of the weak and despairing devotee of existing forms and established institutions from the Pharisees of Judea eighteen hundred years ago down to the present hour. This class crucified Jesus, stoned Stephen, imprisoned Paul, anathematized Luther, burnt the martyrs, hanged and imprisoned the Quakers, and denounced as Infidels and heretics those who dared to disturb and disquiet them in their devotion to their cherished delusions and inherited fallacies.

How long must fraud, fallacy, and flattery be the spiritual instrumentalities to purify, enlighten, redeem, and save the world? How long must the disgusting platitudes of ancient heathenism with all its mythology, with its crude and senseless gibberish, its weird and wild imaginings, its baseless visions and speculations, be the standard of thought and belief for us of this nineteenth century? How long are we to look down to the stupid, stultified, and ignorant for our guides and instructors in the mysteries and truths of modern divine revelations? Is there no redress? Are we to be forever afflicted with this incubus of ancient ghostology, because bad and ignorant men hav called it "holy?" How long must "holy" blindness and "holy" stupidity be on the lead and shape the fate and the destiny of the human family? T. E. Longshore.

Missionary News.

Dr. Geo. L. Pentecost, who has just returned from a two years' evangelistic mission to Scotland, and who has in contemplation a mission of similar character to the Indian empire, gave in Boston, July 17th, a long account of the new field opening to him, from which I make these encouraging extracts —encouraging to us Liberals and discouraging, I should think, to the Christian missionary:

There were in India about 5,000,000 nativs who had attained an English education. The first people among whom it was proposed to conduct the contemplated evangelistic work were the Englishmen there. The second element in the field consisted of the educated Anglo-Indians. Many of these had become Infidels to the extent that they had come to disbelieve in the truths of Brahmanism but had not come to believe in Christianity. There were 15,000 matriculated nativ students in Calcutta alone in its institutions of learning. These people were very docil, and Infidels from abroad had taken advantage of that very fact to spread their teachings among them. A million copies of one of Ingersoll's lectures had been reprinted in one of the dialects of India. Again, the missionaries now there were begging that evangelists should come out to preach the gospel to them, saying, "We are walled in and oppressed in spirit by paganism, and we want to hav some one to preach to us."

Isn't this good news? A million copies of one of Ingersoll's lectures circulating in India! Does any one know which lecture it is?

Speaking of the method which it is proposed to adopt, Mr. Pentecost said it was to be evangelistic—simply to preach the gospel. He was not to be sent out by any board of missions, proud as he would be to be so sent; he and his co-laborers were to go out simply because of the Bible call. They would not try to prove the gospel or to establish any theological school. The educated Brahman was fully as keen in argument as the educated American, and perhaps a little more so. Nothing, therefore, pleased him better than to draw the Christian into an argument as to the comparativ merits of Christianity and Brahmanism. Argument, therefore, was not to be used, but the gospel of Christ was simply to be preached.

"He would not try to prove the gospel." There he shows his good sense. Past experience has convinced him there is no such thing as proving the gospel. He has found the "educated Brahman" a "little more keen" than the Christian, and that it "pleases" the educated Brahman to draw the Christian into an argument, confuse and confute him. What an admission! And for this reason "argument is not to be used, but simply to preach the gospel!" What is a gospel good for that cannot bear the argument of a "pagan Brahman?" Fatal admission! Would the Christian refuse to use argument if he could thereby overthrow the pagan? Of course not; and yet the whole of this discourse of Pentecost was for the sole purpose of inducing "a small volunteer band of Christians from this country to join his mission party;" for he is to "be joined in England by a company of ladies and gentlemen of social position and independent means, who go out with him to assist in the mission." What a good time they will hav in preaching and refusing to argue, as our learned D.D.'s do in this country when they attack "Infidelity" behind their pulpit ramparts, and then when challenged to come out in an open, clear fight respectfully decline, alleging they will not debate with an Infidel alias pagan or heathen? O Christianity, thou art in this nineteenth century smothered with thine own breath, but knowest it not, for the fires within thee are kindled by hypocrisy, ignorance, and mammon! As sure as right is right and wrong is wrong, all the wealth being heaped up by the churches cannot save them from the doom written upon their accursed walls by the unerring, progressiv finger of science, truth, and life. Does Electricity Produce Instantaneous Death?

The law of electrocution is a New York production. It was conceived and ratified by the New Yorkers, and it has just been tried on a New York subject. The current was passed through him, and permitted to flow for eighteen seconds; but this did not kill him, and two minutes later it was passed through him again for an indefinit period, when the froth gathered at his mouth, and it was thought his soul had gone to see the God that made him, and incidentally, the dynamo, the executioner, and its other accessories. The third time conquers, says an old adage. As Mr. Kemmler still persisted in breathing, the current was turned on once more, and allowed to flow four minutes; then smoke issued from his mouth; the odor of burning flesh filled the apartment, and the victim was adjudged dead enough for an autopsy; and if the current did not kill him the autopsy did. No more will he promis to cling to his wife "till death;" no more will he break one commandment to keep another; no more will he reduce the population of his nativ state just before the census is taken. He has gone where the light of God illuminates the city, and dynamos are unknown; but his murderers still enjoy mundane society. I am a professional electrician, and I hav done all that I could to oppose the operation of this infamous law. Electricity can only produce death by the violence it does to the body. An expert told me a few days ago that animals had recovered from the effects of the strongest artificial currents; and unless some part of the body is fatally burnt or ruptured, the case is one of suspended animation, and the revival is only a question of time. I conclude with an article I wrote eight months ago, which has been refused by the leading papers.

As the government of this state has decided to administer capital punishment by electricity hereafter, it is relevant to inquire if this agency can be utilized to produce death instantaneously in all cases, and if so, to ascertain by just what process this "desirable end" would be accomplished. I submit that the electric current in passing through the body produces at least three distinctiv but inseparable effects, of which any, if acting alone and sufficiently powerful, would destroy life. The most prominent of these is the forcible contraction of the muscles, which may be drawn so tightly about the arteries as to impede the circulation of the blood, produce congestions, and stop the action of the heart. The calorific effect of electricity is to increase the temperature of the parts through which it passes, and this may produce their disruption or combustion. The current also exerts an electrolytic action on the system. The magnitude of these effects is proportional to the energy of the electromotiv force of the current, practically proportional to the duration of its flow, and inversely proportional to the resistance of its path or circuit. If their conjoint influence "paralyzes the nerves," or produces unconsciousness in less time than 0.03 of one second, it must act more quickly than sensation, and produce a painless death.

But if this period be prolonged the subject will die an agonizing death. He will feel as though his muscles were being lacerated and violently separated from the bones, and also experience the acute sensations of an incipient combustion which will be much intensified at the points of contact. I write this from experience. The duration of consciousness under these conditions (other things being equal) is dependent on the electrical resistance of the individual and his powers of endurance, and he may revive in the grave. The condition known as rigor mortis does not follow in cases of apparent death from electricity. I believe it is stated now on good authority that the proximity of the human body to the earth will neutralize the effects of the strongest current. Nearly all that hav been killed by artificial electricity hav called attention to their respectiv situations, and some hav described their experience. A superintendent of the Brush Electric Lighting System, in Dayton, O., received a powerful current by accident. He walked to a place of rest several feet distant and exclaimed, "The life has been burnt out of me." I think he died about eight minutes later. An instance is mentioned by Professor Thomson of some man, I do not remember whom, who received in direct circuit the electro-motiv force of 1,000 volts. We find by assuming the resistance of this man's body and its contacts, at the hands, to hav been 10,000 ohms, which is a very fair estimate, that he received a continuous current of 0 1 of one ampere. It is said this condition had lasted fifteen minutes when some one discovered his situation. If this be true he received in that period a charge of 90 coulombs, and this did not kill him. The resistance of the body may be reduced to an average of about 2000. ohms, by the proposed applisnces with their several connections.

As the normal electromotiv force of the most powerful alternating current machines is about 1 000 volts, the condemned will probably receive a current of about 0.5 of an ampere, which flowing three minutes, would amount to 90. coulombs, the quantity of continuous current electricity that was withstood by one I hav mentioned. However, an alternating current is somewhat more dangerous than a continuous one. The electromotiv force of an ordinary flash of lightning is about 1,000 000 volts. I am opposed to all murder—be it judicial or otherwise—and I do not believe that two wrongs make a right. However, if these things "must be," I suggest a more humane, simple, and efficient means of execution than the present method, or the one that preceded it. Let the condemned be put into an air-tight cell, in one part of which shall be placed a quantity of cyanide of potassium, and directly above it a glass vessel of hydrocyanic acid, which may be liberated by an electric mechanism breaking the glass. The admixture of these chemicals would produce the most concentrated fumes of prussic acid. The condemned would inhale an agreeable perfume, resembling the odor of peach blossoms, and this, in my judgment, would produce instant unconsciousness and eternal oblivion. Julien Marcellas.

A Just Judgment.

The proof of a poet shall be sternly deferred
Till his country absorbs him as affectionately
As he has absorbed it. — Whitman.

This is true of all who teach new and, especially, unwelcome facts. They are condemned, ostracized, and often martyrized for speaking, writing, and publishing facts which the world will not be prepared for for ages yet to come. Still, if the few who see clearly are silent, the needed reform will never be pushed.

Habit, old influences, and a reverence for authority hold back the multitude; and the few who get great glimpses of great truths are called fools and fanatics and cranks and lunatics. For instance, see the judgments rendered against Moses Harman by a court and jury who hav no more "absorbed" him than an ignorant Catholic can absorb Darwin.

"Crucify him," "Crucify him," has ever been the cry of pope, priest, and prelate, who are determined to rule or ruin.

It is so easy to condemn where one fails to understand. The few who are radically individualized must suffer for their farsightedness and foresightedness. The tyrant anathematizes and punishes what his small soul cannot "absorb," forgetting that "he or she is the greatest who contributes the greatest practical example."

Friends, I hav been through the mill—I hav "absorbed" a little of the great mass of truth that Moses Harman has fought for. I now plead for him; as one pleads who has tasted and still tastes the martyrdom of being misunderstood. I want you to help in the good work. As you know, I hav petitions for Harman's release from the enormous penalty of five years in prison for printing and mailing a simple Latin word in a letter exposing a man's cruel and brutal attack upon his sick and helpless wife. No one claims to be injured by the letter, and why then punish the publisher?

Hundreds admit being made kinder, more tender, and more tolerant by reading the articles the ignorant condemn. Should we not then rather reward than punish the publisher? I shall feel honored by each and every application from you for petitions, and hope you will send for them at once. This is the time when our work is needed. Take hold wherever opportunity offers and do your best. As we worked for D. M. Bennett in his time of need, let us work for Moses Harman in his time of need. Every name asked for in the signing of the petitions opens the door for discussion and inquiry, and these two influences are the leading ones toward knowledge and happiness.

I hav read Harman's paper, Lucifer, the Light Bearer, from its initial number, and am a cleaner, purer, better, and happier woman to day from its influence. I hav

Read these leaves to myself in the open air,
Tried them by trees, stars, and rivers,
And found nothing to insult my soul
Or defile my body. — Whitman adapted.

That Prize Manual.

In answer to many inquiries concerning this book, I am happy to report progress. The manuscripts did not all come in as soon as desired, and some very important ones are delayed even yet. We want and intend to hav the best we can get, and the delay of a few weeks is nothing compared with the importance of the subject.

There was much delay in getting a committee. Our well-known Liberals all declined for want of time, etc. Prof. Felix Adler, of the Ethical Culture Society, accepted from a profound sense of duty, and is now in the Adirondacks, loaded down with our manuscripts. He is a very busy, overworked gentleman. Prof. Daniel G. Brinton, of the University of Pennsylvania, has done nobly, and is very discriminating in his judgment. He has written more books than some of us hav ever read. In undertaking to examin our manuscripts, he has greatly taxed his time and strength. Prof. Frances Emily White, of the Woman's Medical College, Philadelphia, a lady of great ability and learning, had very unexpectedly to go to Europe to attend the great medical convention in Berlin, but will return September 1st, and will review what the other members of the committee hav done; while Miss Craddock and myself hav done a vast amount of "weeding"—she between the brick walls of notoriously hot Philadelphia, without a day's vacation, and I in my "cottage by the sea," where I came to work, not to rest.

We are doing the best we can and all we can, and must ask our friends to be patient and giv us time to do our work well. We hope, but do not promis, to make the award at our congress, the latter part of October.

The Army of the American Secular Union.

By permission of the writer, we print the following, from a member:

Orange County, Ia., June 8, 1890.

Miss Ida C. Craddock, Secretary American Secular Union, Dear Madam: I read your last communication in Freethought and your appeal for organization in it. You will never succeed in making an army of the different Liberals, for the simple reason that there is not a single one who has not his own views, and has but precious little consideration for anybody else's.

I would like to see how you could form an army out of Anarchists, Secularists, terrorists, Socialists, Nationalists, Theists, Atheists, Agnostics, Materialists, Spiritualists, etc., every mother's soul of whom considers his own ism as the particular point at issue, and make them toe a line and work in unison.

I, myself, hold Anarchistic views, and the effect of it is, that even the idea of an army, its regiments and companies, is repulsiv to me, which makes me a bad soldier for a commander whose tactics rest on a wrong basis, according to my view, although my confidence in voluntary coöperation makes me put my shoulder to the wheel, and so it is with almost every Liberal.

If you could draw up something like a creed, which every Liberal could indorse, your idea might succeed, but such is manifestly impossible. And even if you achieved the impossible, every single one of your soldiers would insist that his or her idea would preëminently be the only way to proceed to execution, and criticise and cavil at every order issued by headquarters.

Guerrilla warfare seems the best adapted to Liberal tactics, and if on some rare occasions Liberals seem to combine in offering a solid front toward the enemy, they always do so in order to shut the stable after the horse has broken loose, as in the late Harman case, and at the same time keep up a continual quarrel with each other on minor points.

Without a common basis on which all agree there can be no permanent organization.

Inclosed find a couple more dollars to help the guerrilla along, and believe me, yours very respectfully, (Signed) G. A. F. Lespinasse, M.D.

The above hits the nail on the head. It explains, in a nutshell, just what the difficulty is in the way of the success of Freethought. Liberals fail to unite in fighting the common enemy, not because they can't, but because they won't.

And yet we hav a common creed. One and all, we resent ecclesiastical tyranny; one and all, we recognize the fact that freedom to promulgate our special "ism" can never be perfectly secure so long as any religious power can get its grip upon the throat of the state. And this creed is nothing more nor less than what the American Secular Union is contending for. Why should not the various classes to whom Dr. Lespinasse refers join us in this fight?

Spiritualists! Are you not, even now, planning a political move to avenge the unfairness with which medium Reid has been treated by a United States court of justice? Were church and state wholly separate, think you that such an act of injustice would hav been possible?

Materialists! You claim, and very properly, that if you see reason to deny the existence of a God and a future life you shall hav the right to proclaim your belief openly. And you, Agnostics, you also claim the right to at least question their existence, without fear of legal ostracism. But in my own state of Pennsylvania, any of you might, by implication of the constitution, be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under the commonwealth. Not until the affairs of the state are administered on a purely secular basis, will such disabilities be removed in Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

Atheists! Of how much worth is your testimony accounted in most of our courts of justice to day? No matter how upright your lives, your avowed disbelief in God too frequently ranks you along with idiots and felons, and below women, in the eyes of the law. Hav you no interest in securing a total separation of the state from church interference?

Theists! When the National Reformers shall hav had their way, how long can you go on preaching up a deity who is the exponent of your own highest self? Do you not understand that they intend that every knee shall bend before their Holy Trinity, and before no other god? Do you not understand that such intention, supported by law, means persecution of you and your fellows? How mistaken, then, is your action in refusing to join the army of the American Secular Union, which is waging the only organized warfare against these would be uniters of church and state!

Secularists! You whose philosophy teaches you to seek the best things, physically, mentally, and morally, of this world only, without concerning yourselvs about the hereafter! How long, think you, will you escape the persecution of the other-world bigots, when the law backs them up in their demand that you shall lay up treasure for heaven only? The American Secular Union is your graft upon the old Liberal League; but how many of you are to-day loyally tending and watering the new growth, so that it may bring forth fruit for the healing of the nations?

Terrorists! You, who would carry out your schemes by means of physical force and dynamite! Who are the two enemies that you are fighting? Priestcraft and statecraft, are they not? And yet you turn your backs on the American Secular Unionists, who are doing all they can to weaken the alliance between these two!

Socialists and Nationalists! You who believe in coöperation and in a government most truly of the people, by the people, and for the people! Do you think that ecclesiastics will ever step down and out from their exclusiv leadership of the people until the church is put on exactly the same level as are other private clubs? When God gets into the Constitution of the United States, and Christ is made king, and Wilbur P. Crafts succeeds in making it a penal offense to do an honest day's work on Sunday, will not your régime be rather a curse than a blessing to mankind? Will it not open the way to a tyranny worse even than the present dreadful one of competition in the business world? Shall we not then become a nation of religious hypocrits, our promotion depending upon the favor of the only rulers not dethronable by vote—the ecclesiastics? Believe me, the one peril to Socialism and Nationalism lies in the failure to separate church and state, at once and forever.

Anarchists! You who preach the gospel of individualism, and who believe in coöperation only when it is voluntary! Do you not see that every refusal of yours to help your fellows in separating church and state results only in tightening the cord around your own necks? Are you not to-day, because of the exemption of church property from taxation, supporting church property by compulsion? You are continually declaiming against having to pay taxes against your will. Help us to do away with the exemption of church property, and you at once lighten the burden of your own taxation. Moreover, you must remember that the individualism which is your goal is not possible while the false standard of churchly authority is set up for the community to conform to. Ecclesiasticism in the state is your most deadly enemy—you know it well; and only when church and state shall be forever separated will you, or any of us, be quite free to work out an individual development without persecution.

Dear friends, why should we not all unite? Surely this is a creed upon which we can agree—the total separation of church and state.

There is, of course, a reason for the present lack of union among Freethinkers. It is due to the fact that the habit of free and independent thought on religious matters is one that is but slowly acquired, and only amid persecutions, or at least nagging and discouragements from our nearest and dearest. Our early years of Freethought are apt to be one continual fight with our neighbors for just a bit of room to breathe in peace. Nobody helps us; it is a struggle to the death. We are shot at on all occasions, from behind fences of pietism, rocks of prejudice, barriers of conventional propriety. Some day, if we do not perish in the fight, we reach our vantage-ground, and from that lofty plateau of Freethought we can now hurl down missils on our attackers.

Yonder on this same plateau stands another struggling Freethinker. He, too, is defending himself against bigots. And as we look about us we see that every jutting crag is occupied by a fellow-being who, like ourselvs, has fought his way single-handed to this high plateau of Freethought. But, dear me, why should we giv aid to other Freethinkers? Each of us, you know, has all he can do to take care of his own little crag. What, relinquish that cherished stronghold in order to protect anybody else's crag? Perish the thought!

Yonder, in the center of the plateau, rises a wide, very wide and lofty hill whose outlook commands all these jutting crags. Upon this elevation are gathered a little band of soldiers, known as American Secular Unionists. See! They are beckoning to you and to me to come up and join them. "We can overlook every crag," they shout. "We are strongly entrenched up here. If you will all join us, we can command every approach to the plateau of Freethought."

But most of us scorn this invitation. "I am protecting my own little crag of an ism," we one and all reply. And, by and by, when our own attackers, tired out, disappear for a moment, we point triumphantly to our free crag, and sing a pæan to the merits of guerrilla warfare.

Hark! what is that? The enemy's shouts in the rear! Up, up our foes come along the old road about which we had quite forgotten—it has been unused so long—the road whose sign-board reads: "God in the State." Oh, what shall we do? What shall we do? Do you see, through the mist, how many are pressing through the narrow defile? The National Reform people are here and the Sunday Rest people, and the entire force of Roman Catholicism, with its music and banners; and here and there are sharp-shooters who take fancy shots, as they go, at such trivial things as the Bland Dollar and Thanksgiving proclamations and the Sunday disembarking of immigrants upon our shores, and who rarely miss their mark; and behind these come an endless army of the people who carry a banner inscribed with the motto: "No morality possible in our schools without the Bible." These last will some day be our friends; but not now! not now. For this one battle, at least, they are our bitter enemies; we realize that all too well, as they press forward with vindictiv shouts along the old road of "God in the State."

Whizz! There goes a bullet straight into the ranks of the church exemptionists yonder! And now a second! It is those American Secular Unionists from whom we hav held aloof all along who are firing. See! There is commotion in the ranks of our enemies; some one is hit. Good! Giv it to them hard, Secularists! You hav the post of vantage; you can sweep the defile with your guns, and can hold our enemies at bay while I run away to my individual crag and knock down that solitary bigot who has just shown his head. There, sir! Down you shall go, head over heels, and for fear you get up again I will empty all my ammunition into you. Well, I hav done my share in the fight, havn't I?

Why on earth are not those American Secular Unionists firing off their guns? What! "run short of ammunition," eh? Dear me, they might hav some of mine if—if—if I hadn't wasted it all on that bigot down there. Well, now for a run to the last hope—the platform of the American Secular Union.

Why, what a splendid outlook you American Secular Union people hav up here, to be sure! Oh, fool, fool that I was, not to hav come up when you asked me! I could hav protected my own crag, and two or three others, had I been up here at the first. My intentions were excellent, I assure you. But now it is too late—too late—for the enemy are swarming all over the plateau, and the isolated defenders of the crags are being mowed down one after the other.

Liberals! the above is not a mere fancy; it is a true forecast of what will come to pass if you persist in your present dislike of coöperation. You can be very certain of at least one thing—organization is the watchword of the day in all departments of business, and Liberalism will hav to adapt itself to this new order of things, or else go to the wall.

The Union's Appeal.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Waiting two weeks for some one else to respond to the courteous address of President Westbrook, F. C. Mende, and Ida C. Craddock, who join in an "Appeal to the Liberal Lecturer," I hav concluded to break the ominous silence.

I cannot see how any Liberal lecturer can consistently disregard the appeal. It is true, as it asserts, we are working for the same cause—the right to express independent thought, separation of church and state; hence, "we ought to be united into one undivided army." We ought to hav "coöperation"—that is the word. I, therefore, will contribute a few short letters (rather than a long article) on this subject.

That there is a marked coolness existing between Liberal lecturers and the American Secular Union is apparent to even a cursory observer. Why is it? Are the lecturers to blame? Is the Union to blame? Are both to blame, or neither?

Let us try to discover and rectify the error if we can. A plain talk is necessary to a clear understanding.

Freethought is based upon the principle that each has the right of free expression equal to all others who may differ—in other words, that diversity of expression should be as free as diversity of thinking. On this basis Spiritualists hav coöperated with the Secular Union hand in hand with Materialists to keep the church and state separate. Many Protestants and some Catholics hav also coöperated, for they hav perceived that the cause of the Secular Union is a common cause. And yet this cause languishes. There is no strong, united pull. It is a literal fact, as the appeal states, "Liberals hitherto hav been but a rope of sand." Almost sadly our Secular Union officers confess that the "national army of the American Secular Union," with all their splendid equipments of principles, are in disgrace—beating a disgraceful retreat before the apparently resistless march of the "ecclesiastical party;" a party that hate Agnostics, Spiritualists, Infidels; a party that will stop their blasphemous mouths by law as soon as "Christian" sentiment will justify its enforcement. "The ecclesiastical party gain on Liberals." So say our Secular Union generals. This is humiliating. The worst of it is, I am inclined to think it is true. But Judge Westbrook and his fellow-officers inform us that we "Liberals outnumber the church party ten to one." And yet they hav us on the run, hav they? I will pay my respects to this matter of numbers in a future letter.

Is it a fact that the Union has ignored the lecturers, and the lecturers in turn ignored the Union? That there is no coöperation between them worth mentioning appears to be the situation. There is no good reason why the Union could not be made a powerful organization by the Liberals of America in defense of our liberties. Hav we the good sense and the generalship to make it a solid organization? That is the question. Will we reform our ranks and march to victory?

"Will you not work with us and for us? Will you not speak a good word for the national organization to your audiences?" is the language of the appeal. Doubtless the lecturers hav been indifferent about this matter. They hav seemingly imbibed the notion, whether justly or not, that the American Secular Union is an exclusiv body for the benefit of a select few, caring little about the lecturers—the activ workers in the field, men and women who meet foes face to face and beard the orthodox lion in his den, and who should not presume to criticise such an august assembly as the American Secular Union.

Lecturers hav been obliged "since the beginning" to conduct a guerrilla warfare without the shadow of an organization to back them.

If there is any way to unite the Liberal forces it should be done.

In my next I will endeavor to point out some of the causes of our failure—a most pitiful, shameful failure. I do not need to argue this. The appeal concedes it. W. F. JAMIESON.

THE NEXT LETTER.

Although the national organization is fourteen years old it has never been of any practical value to the lecturer—I mean to lecturers in general. They hav had to fight their way single-handed and alone. That such an organization ought to hav been a help to all Liberal lecturers is now acknowledged in this friendly appeal, "Such coöperation, if properly managed, would mean a gain both to the cause and to you individually." That has the right ring. There has been too much work exacted of the lecturers for the benefit of the cause without regard to their welfare. They hav been expected to cope with bigotry, sometimes mobocratic superstition, and surrounded by timid Liberals advising a cessation of hostilities.

It is now proposed to change all this. We are assured in this appeal that if the lecturers will coöperate with the Secular Union, "each lecturer in the country would hav a regular series of appointments." This is broad. It does not exclude the Spiritualist lecturer. It should not. It does not bar the Materialist. The Secular Union does not ask any lecturer to lay aside his independence. Well would it hav been for the Secular cause if all societies claiming to be Liberal could hav sunk their sectarianism and grasped the meaning of liberty. The weakness in the united efforts of Spiritualists and Materialists has been a want of understanding of the breadth of the Liberal movement. Spiritualists in some Liberal Leagues, which I organized years ago, bitterly opposed my engagement as a lecturer for the very societies I had organized! Need we go to the church for an exhibition of bigotry? I hav known Materialists just as bigoted and ill-Liberal, who refused to listen to or help engage Spiritualist lecturers who are doing valiant service for the Liberal cause. This is childish. My motto all my life long has been, "Hear the other side." How can a Liberal be Liberal who fails to practice this motto? He cannot be. I remember once advocating before a Secular society, composed almost wholly of Materialists, the idea that we would never hav a free platform until societies invited speakers, capable of instructing or entertaining an audience, without any reference to the speakers' views concerning this world or any other. It raised a storm of dissent. "Pay money to men to come here and advocate what we do not believe?" I know this is a complete reversal of the past and present order of things. Secular and Spiritualist societies, with all their condemnation of sectarianism, are but little in advance of the church—so little that Materialists and Spiritualists, two wings of the Liberal army, hav never worked together heartily, notwithstanding they are more in accord about the affairs of this world than any other great bodies of people. Their main difference refers to the evidence of a future life. This evidence is entirely satisfactory to all thorough Spiritualists, but does not convince the Materialist. Several years ago both sides, on divers occasions, attempted to coalesce by an agreement to not debate the only great difference between them. This compromise by people who, from their start, were unreservedly in favor of free discussion! A unity obtained at the cost of their corner-stone principle made their relations strained and unnatural, just as we might expect they would be. Had freedom of discussion been fully adopted, which both parties profess to believe in, manly avowals would hav been the order of the day instead of ex parte disquisitions. Protestants say they believe in the "right of private judgment," and damn a man for exercising the right they believe in! So Materialists and Spiritualists believe in free speech—and refuse to coöperate with those who practice what they believe! W. F. JAMIESON.

From Mr. Heywood's Cell.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I asked leave to be sent to Dedham again, but Judge Carpenter insisted on a penitentiary, not a county jail merely, so the United States government boards me here this time. Since I left Brown University, in February, 1858, thirty-two years, in Antislavery, Peace, Woman Suffrage, Temperance, Labor, and Social Reform, as lecturer, author, editor, I hav worked in prose. Now my thoughts flow in this strain:—

FREEDOM, ORDER.

Liberty, the nerve and spring of power,
The way, the truth, and life of being's use;
The parent love in every flower,
The start and goal of civilizing force.

Oh! light and hope to seek and hav the best;
Be ours to sense and serve thy inmost truth.
Alert on facts to build, in ends to rest,
Toward which Creation moves in activ Faith.

Who call thy habit rash, thy purpose lewd,
Bespeak uncouth neglect of Nature's fact
That, to hav clean order in multitude,
Their rights, Home Rule in all must each respect.

Senates benight, courts confuse, armies rage;
But morning truths, in jocund persons known,
Conquer collectiv wrong, from age to age;
Law livs in Right discerned and duty done.

For you, for me, and all the race alike,
It is to be to do upon their choice;
Whatever path of life we chance to take
Our innermost informs the outer voice.

Enriched or poor, in jail or free, Be Right;
Affirmed in that, to you we each must come.
I Am the It of life, benign in might,
Whereby the needs of all arrive in One.

One's right to life, to work, and hav the fruit,
The right to know, the will to serve plain need,
Assures another's thrift in self-support,
If Social Wit states say "Hands off" to greed.

Mistaken zeal reports "Suppressed." Not much.
Though Flesh lies prone, the Spirit, strong tenfold;
Nerves Right assailed, erect, to dare the touch,
And Thought, struck down, upsprings to rule the world.

I can write home sixteen times each year, including four sheets like this, addressing four different persons if I choose, but all must go in one envelope to one person, so this will be remailed to you. All letters sent will reach me. Say to friends, please, that I shall be very glad to hear from them, though I can reply only as above. The drift of thought and action outside, relativ to the grave issues of freedom, right, and duty pending, greatly interests me. Are we to hav Mental Freedom, are souls to be forbidden to tell bodies what to do and what not to do, in these states? is the question. Among Colonel Ingersoll's telling words are these two: "Honor bright;" truth and reason, fair dealing, are inseparable from just, useful, honorable action. Decoy, falsehood, "spotting" used, "ordered" by a cabinet officer to be used to entrap innocent citizens, are not quite the thing to be encouraged in practice or accepted as "law" by intelligent, honest people. Daniel Webster said: "The true office of government is to protect persons and property from invasion;" this view all Freethinkers accept. Statutes against fictitious "offenses," laws to make one "an offender for a word," are irrational, unconstitutional, and void.

But my space is limited. Friends of liberty and progress will be activ to see that wrong is righted and justice done. I am quite well; not voluntarily here, not self-imprisoned, my confinement is a part of Freethought destiny. Those who know what is right, and dare maintain it, will not quietly acquiesce in "legal wrong" done. Regards to all.

Yours ever, EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

A statue of Voltaire was unveiled by M. LeRoyer, president of the French senate, in the market-place of Ferney. The city of Geneva (John Calvin's city!) sent a deputation headed by M. Richard, councillor of state, and M. Didier, vice-president of the executiv council. M. LeRoyer, in his address, spoke of Voltaire as the greatest master of the French tongue, the brightest and most keenly perceptiv mind of the eighteenth century, and in a sense the father of the republic.

A new Freethought society has seen the light of day in Harten, Saxony. It calls itself the "Society for Mental Improvement." There is a great deal in that name. Mrs. Wilhelmi gave the first lecture, "Worship of God and Immortality." We wish the new society a much longer life than had the Leipzig society, and that it may bring the gospel of science and toleration to all narrow-path walkers, and especially to the police authorities of Saxony and Prussia, who seem to be wandering about in mediæval darkness.

It is startling, although not very wonderful, says the Catholic Weekly Review, to find that the royal decree nominating a prefect who is to take the place of the dissolved municipal council of Rome, selects for that position a notorious Freethinker and Freemason, the deputy Finocchiaro-Aprile, who holds a high place in the supreme council of the Masonic organization. It would be difficult to suggest a step better calculated to offend the susceptibilities of Catholics who treasure the ancient memories and traditions of the papal city.

The little republic San Marino has followed the example set by Italy. Parochial schools are closed, and all religious orders hav received notification to the effect that within two months they must deliver to the government a complete list of all their property, personal as well as real. The Vatican sent an embassador to the president, but found that the latter could not be moved. Now the pope is praying in his private chapel and the cardinals are getting ready to write a bull of excommunication of the St. Marino goverment, if the most holy father's prayers should fail to be answered.

The Freethinkers in Holland cannot be very much beloved by the "love-your-enemies" professors, judging from two series of articles which originally appeared in a liberal-minded daily paper and in another the editorial chair of which is occupied by a narrow-minded pulpit-pounder. The discussion started over a very innocent pamphlet published by our contemporary De Dageraad (Daybreak), and which was send broadcast over the land. The reverend editor uses arguments like these (they are so handy, and need only ignorance and insolence as backers): "A vile and shameful publication . . . devilish, morality-destroying . . . the lewdness of the pamphlet," etc. The pamphlet thus designated contains nothing but historical truths, and endeavors to open the eyes of people to the fact that the clergy are dangerous guides.

The Prussians are drawing a fine line on blasphemy, as we learn from the Munich correspondent to the Sonntags-Blatt. On July 14th Frau Wilhelmi was advertised to lecture on "Man the Product of his Education," at the hall of the Free Religious Society. But, says the correspondent, man proposes and government disposes, especially in Prussia, the land of devotion and pious customs. The royal Prussian court, through the royal police headquarters, issued an order for her arrest, and she was taken to prison on a charge of blasphemy, where she remained twenty-four hours before being liberated on a bail bond of fifteen hundred marks. The correspondent concludes his letter with these encouraging words: "For the honor of Bavaria let it be said that in March this year, Frau Wilhelmi was not molested on account of her lecture; also that immediately upon her liberation permission to lecture was given by the royal Bavarian police. Yet the lecture did not come off, not because Frau Wilhelmi lacked courage, but because the friend who had gone on her bail bond, and through personal influence protected her, asked her to remain silent that he might not be involved in further trouble." Subsequently, Herr Spindlbauer, the president of the society, read one of Frau Wilhelmi's lectures to an audience of several hundreds, and was not molested, though the police were present.

The Condemnation of Dr. Walter Reid.

A meeting of the St. Paul Spiritual Alliance and of the Liberals of the city was called to take some action concerning the condemnation of Dr. Walter E. Reid. The meeting was held at the parlors of Mr. A. P. Miller. In the absence of the president of the Alliance, Mr. A. E. Sauer was called to the chair. The object of the meeting was stated, and the following statement was then made by Mr. Miller:

In November, 1889, Dr. Walter E. Reid was tried before the United States court at Grand Rapids, Mich., for violating section 5 480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This section imposes a penalty of not more than $500, or imprisonment for not more than eighteen months, or both, upon any person convicted of using the United States mails to defraud. It is not necessary to show that any person was injured by any such use of the mails, nor that the mails were injured or endangered, but only that a fraudulent use was made of them. The party sending the mail matter and the party receiving it may both be benefited and both be perfectly honest in their intentions, but the act of sending may nevertheless be construed into a crime.

On the first trial the jury disagreed, but on the second trial, the court allowed only one side to be heard and that was the side of the government, or the prosecution, so that the accused was necessarily convicted, and he was thereupon sentenced to the Detroit House of Correction for one year. The proceedings show that Dr. Reid was brought before the court to be condemned and not to be tried, since he was allowed only a semi-trial, and that solely with the view of convicting him.

Tho judges who presided at this condemnation, it seems, were one Jackson and one Severens, and they hav achieved a bad eminence and a name for prejudice, bigotry, injustice, and ignorance which certainly places them in the front ranks of the unjust judges of history.

The complaint charged that "one Walter E. Reid wrongfully and unlawfully devised a certain scheme and artifice to defraud," etc., and "did then and there knowingly and wrongfully propose to secure communications from spirit-land by and through the agency of sealed letters," etc. The indictment also charged that "the said Walter E. Reid did then and there unlawfully and feloniously profess and falsely pretend to secure communications from the spirit-land upon the request of any person who might desire the same."

Dr. Reid had over forty witnesses to testify that his claims were genuin; that he could and did (1) read sealed letters, and (2) receive communications from spirit-land, or from departed or disbodied spirits; that they believed he was sincere and honest in his claims and that they believed the answers and messages received through him were genuin.

The court refused to allow these witnesses to testify, the ruling by Judge Jackson being in these forever infamous words: "It is prima-facie evidence of fraud and requires no proof!" and "There are some things so absurd that this court will not stultify itself by taking testimony thereon!"

Being thus unjustly and infamously denied a hearing and an opportunity to prove the genuinness of his powers and the justness of his claims, Dr. Reid, on the motion for a new trial, offered to prove that he possessed psychometric power by reading any letter which the judge might hav in his pocket without opening the same. The bitterly prejudiced and unjust Judge Severens turned upon his greatly wronged and outraged victim and said his "court was no place for exhibitions of the tricks of mountebanks and jugglers, whose tricks he would not believe if sworn to on a pile of Bibles!"

All hope and all chance was thus cut off and the outrage of "confirming the judgment of the trial court," without giving the victim a hearing, was consummated, and Dr. Walter E. Reid, denied a hearing, denied a new trial, denied every right accorded to the vilest criminal, was hustled to a felon's cell with the brutal and outrageous insult of the judge still ringing in his ears.

This semi-trial, these condemnation proceedings miscalled a trial, present one of the greatest judicial outrages in all the history of so-called courts of justice, since not only the law but the principles of justice were violated by judges sworn to administer the law. The court violated the law, the principles of justice, and its own solemn and sacred oath in the following particulars:

1. The law is that the motiv makes the act criminal, and that motiv must be shown. The court refused to allow the prisoner to show motiv.

2. The law is that the accused shall hav the right to prove his belief and honesty in what he claims. The court denied this right.

3. The law is that "the best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible must be produced." Dr. Reid had over forty witnesses ready to furnish such evidence, but the court refused them the right to testify.

4. The great common law rule is that all persons are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty. The court of Jackson and Severens reversed this rule, and declared the accused "guilty prima facie and no proof required."

5. The law is that before a prisoner can be convicted of fraud, it must be determined that he did not do as he agreed to do. The court of Judges Jackson and Severens ruled that any evidence to determin this was admissible and it was so admitted; but that, on the other hand, any evidence to show that Reid did do as he agreed to, was inadmissible and therefore it was not admitted.

Now as to the consequences of these unjust rulings should they become the established precedents:

1. If any person claims to do anything which the court believes to be absurd or impossible, testimony will not be admitted to prove that it can be done. The belief or opinion of the court shall govern and shall be the law "made on the spot." Such claim shall be prima-facie evidence of fraud and no proof will be required nor admitted. The common law rule will be reversed, the presumption will be against the accused, the burden of proof will be upon him, he must be prima-facie guilty, and must show his innocence. But—

2. Courts, in such cases, cannot stultify their intelligence by admitting testimony to prove a matter which in the opinion of the court is absurd. The accused must prove his innocence, but no testimony will be allowed him to make such proof. He must make bricks but no straw will be allowed him.

3. In all cases where persons claim powers or gifts contrary to the knowledge, belief, or opinion of the court, such opinion must govern. The opinion of others, though based upon experience, observation, thorough test, and actual and repeated knowledge of the facts, will not be admitted in evidence.

4. Persons who claim to receive communications from departed or disbodied spirits, or from the spirit-world, shall be considered frauds prima facie by the courts, and no testimony will be admitted to prove the truth of their claims or the genuinness of their powers. If spirit mediums, psychics, or sensitivs make use of the mails in the exercise of their powers and their vocation, they shall be fined or imprisoned or both by the federal courts without a hearing, for they are prima facie frauds and no proof is required. If they use their powers or gifts for pay, as the priests and ministers of other religions do, they are liable to fine and imprisonment under state law for obtaining money by fraud.

In conclusion, a few comments:

The East Indian prince, when a missionary informed him that he had seen water so hard that it would support an elephant, at once dismissed the missionary as a fraud, since it was contrary to the observation of the prince that ice should form. This precedent Judges Jackson and Severens appear to hav followed, only that they were infinitly more cruel, for instead of dismissing the man who brought them the truth, they condemned him to prison.

Dr. Lardner, an authority in natural philosophy, had just demonstrated to his class in London that steam navigation was impossible, when a steam vessel came sweeping into the port of Liverpool. Proudhon had shown to his class in Paris that such an animal as the giraffe did not and could not exist, when a caravan arrived in the city with a living giraffe. These learned and distinguished men were only dogmatic, opinionated, and mistaken, and their conclusions were harmless, but Judges Jackson and Severens, while equally dogmatic, opinionated, and mistaken, hav expressed their opinion in a decision which does unspeakable injustice and harm to a fellow-man, and denounces all spirit mediums and psychics as frauds.

If these rulings did not strike too deep for levity, and if they were not too monstrous for ridicule, we might compare these judges to the Dutch justice who decided that the complainant had bitten his own nose off. The injured man undertook to show that such an act was impossible, but the court silenced and overruled him with the remark that "no ting ish imbossibel mit Gott!" If the rulings of these federal judges are not equally absurd, they are equally unjust and contrary to law, and if they excite less contempt they provoke infinitly more indignation.

Spiritualists and Liberals should remember that the question as to whether Dr. Reid committed fraud or not, whether he is a genuin and honest medium or not, does not enter into the subject. The court has condemned all claims to mediumship as fraud, prima facie, and will not admit any testimony to show the contrary.

The following resolutions were then unanimously adopted:

Resolved, By the representativs of the Spiritual Alliance and of the Liberal element of St. Paul, here assembled, that we adopt the paper just read as embodying our sentiments concerning the judicial outrage committed upon Dr. Walter E. Reid.

Resolved, That we urge upon the Spiritualists and Liberals of the country the necessity of some united action for the purpose of laying before the people the facts concerning this flagrant wrong to an American citizen.

Resolved, That we urge all liberal and fair-minded persons to lay aside all differences and unite in petitions to the president of the United States to exercise the pardoning power and restore to Dr. Reid the liberty of which he is so unjustly deprived.

Resolved, That we urge the Spiritualists and Liberals of the country to unite in demanding the removal of Judges Jackson and Severens from the bench which they hav dishonored.

Resolved, That we urge the mediums of the country to organize a national Medium's Defense Association, for the purpose of securing funds, employing counsel, and commanding such other aid as may be necessary for defense in the unjust and un-American war which bigotry and intolerance hav inaugurated against them.

Resolved, That we urge the Spiritualists of the country to unite with the Liberals in demanding the repeal of those sections of the postal laws relating to the mailing of so-called obscene and fraudulent matter, under which, and through the abuse of which, Liberals and Spiritualists are sent to prison for the mere expression of opinions and the mere exercise of the highest psychic powers; thus converting every letter-box into a steel trap to catch Liberals and aid bigotry in the suppression of Liberal literature.

Resolved, That, in our judgment, the time has arrived for Spiritualists and Liberals to unite in some political movement or action, to the end that free thought, free speech, and a free press may not be suppressed by a code of laws more rigorous than the infamous Blue laws of our Puritan ancestors. And as an encouragement to such political action, we cite the example of the Spiritualists of Ohio, who, to rebuke a Republican legislature which passed a law taxing mediums $300 for exercising their gifts, united in the gubernatorial campaign following, and elected a Democratic governor. The rebuke so alarmed the politicians that at the next session of the legislature, both Republicans and Democrats vied with each other for the credit of repealing the obnoxious law.

Resolved, That copies of the above address and resolutions, together with the proceedings of this meeting, be sent by the secretary of the alliance to the Spiritual and Liberal papers of the country with a request to publish the same.

E. A. SAUER, Chairman.
MRS. TUTTLE, Sec. St. Paul Spiritual Alliance.

The Assembly of Progress.

Will you kindly giv me space in your esteemed paper on behalf of the founders of the Assembly of Progress, to correct the erroneous statements made by Mr. Reynolds, in regard to the Assembly of Progress, in your issue of July 19th?

Had all your readers a copy of the constitution and laws of the Assembly of Progress, no notice of this unjust attack would be necessary from me; and from the statements made by Mr. Reynolds I am charitable enough to believe that he himself has never read a copy of the constitution and laws governing the grand and subordinate Assemblies of Progress, else he would not hav written what he did. But inasmuch as constitutions and circulars hav not been so freely distributed as thought by Mr. Reynolds, but few of your readers hav had an opportunity to read the constitution and laws governing the Order of the Assembly of Progress, and hav no means of knowing the objects, purpose, and business principles upon which it is based, and therefore may be misled by Mr. Reynolds's communication, unless his erroneous statements are corrected.

Mr. Reynolds says: "Seven hundred members at $6 per year, $4,200; but there is also membership fees, $5 from males, $3 from females, not less than $3,000 more; over $7,000, with hope of $10 000 for doing business of the society the first year, $20,000 the second year, and $100,000 a year if ever the membership reaches ten thousand."

This statement is intended to lead the reader to believe that the officers of the grand assembly receive for their own use fifty cents per month for each member, and $5 for each male and $3 for each female member on initiation. But this is a mistake—all wrong every word of it. The fifty cents per month paid by the members is what is known as the sick and funeral benefit fund, and is paid to sick members at the rate of $5 per week, and in case of death is paid to the legal representativs of the deceased, and not a dollar of it is applied to the use or benefit of any of the officers of the grand assembly (see constitution and laws of the Assembly of Progress, pages 28–30), and the initiation fee of $5 for males and $3 for females, referred to by Mr. Reynolds, is paid into the treasury of the respectiv subordinate assemblies for their sole use and benefit, to pay their hall rents for their meetings and such other expenses and use as may be incidental to the organization, and not a dollar of it, except the charter fee, is ever paid to the officers of the grand assembly.

This disposes of Mr. Reynolds's $7,000 for the first year, $10,000 for the second, and $20 000 for the third year, "for doing business of society," as Mr. Reynolds is pleased to put it.

Mr. Reynolds makes a serious mistake in the amount to be paid by each member to the officers of the grand assembly for the running expenses of the organization. The amount to be paid by each member to defray the necessary expenses of the grand assembly is a per capita tax of $1 per annum for each member, instead of $6, as stated by Mr. Reynolds, making a difference of $5 in $6. Mistakes like this would prove fatal to the banking business. The fees charged by the grand assembly for charters and supplies for the formation of new assemblies is $100. This amount is charged for the charter and supplies furnished by the grand assembly, as provided by the constitution (see page 24), and to defray the expenses of organizing officers, who may be either members of the grand assembly or members of any of the respectiv subordinate assemblies deputized for that purpose by the grand prefect. Surely Mr. Reynolds will not insist that an officer of the assembly can travel, bear his own expenses, and spend his time for nothing in the organizing of assemblies, any more than a lecturer can travel, bear his own expenses, and work for nothing.

After furnishing the charter supplies, paying for the transportation, and paying the organizing officer, there is less than five per cent of the $100 charter fees received by the grand assembly, and the only sources of revenue now provided by the constitution and laws of the order to defray the expenses of the grand assembly are a per capita tax of fifty cents upon each member semi-annually, and what profit there may be in furnishing needed supplies to the subordinate assemblies, and the amount of supplies needed by the subordinate assemblies, after the charter supplies hav been furnished, would be so limited that at a ten per cent profit, which is the profit charged by the grand assembly, in all reasonable probability it would not amount to more than $2 to each assembly per annum. And it is a matter of grave doubt with the officers of the grand assembly whether the sources of revenue provided by the laws of the order will be sufficient to pay the actual cost of printing and binding books, formulas, circulars, and purchasing other supplies, correspondence, and the various incidental expenses attending the organization for the next two years, and at that time the officers of the grand assembly are chosen from among members of the various subordinate assemblies.

Thus it appears from the facts that the statements and insinuations made by Mr. Reynolds of "fat jobs," "the division of spoils," etc., by the managers, as Mr. Reynolds is disposed to call the originators of the Assembly of Progress, is without the slightest foundation, and I consider such an attack by a Liberal very unkind, in the inception of an organization founded in the interest of the cause of Freethought and liberty, and particularly so by one who, from his statements, has never read the constitution and laws governing the order.

The business and beneficiary workings of the order are based upon the same principles as those adopted by those old and standard societies, such as the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Ancient Order of United Workmen, Royal Arcanum, and Independent Order of Foresters, and the monthly mortality assessment upon death is fixed upon the same basis, not taken from theory, but from the long and actual experience of these societies. And while our rate of death assessment is just about the same as the societies named (see table, constitution and by-laws, page 17, and compare), our initiation fee is much less than in any of the orders named, and our sources of revenue much less than those of other orders, and yet I hav heard of none of them wherein any of the managers grew rich out of the fat jobs and division of spoils. But the facts are, the Assembly of Progress has been organized by men who are liberal and who hav been members of other benevolent societies, and are, therefore, somewhat acquainted with kindred societies, and in founding this organization they hav been actuated by none but the best motivs, with a view to form an organization that would become general, wherein Liberals could unite together and advance the cause of truth and freedom undisturbed by superstition and pledges of faith so common to the orthodox creed, and the Assembly of Progress is gaining and growing, and will gain and grow, in numbers, notwithstanding the opposition by the so-called religious world and the jealousies now and then of a cold Liberal.

Los Angeles, Cal., July 30. J. M. Voss.

For Jesus's Sake.*

From the London Agnostic Journal.

Miss I. M. Povey, who in Father Ignatius's little Hell-upon-Earth, at Llanthony, went under the sacred burlesque of a name, "Sister Mary Agnes, O.S.B.," has, through the editorial medium of the Rev. Lancelot Holland, M.A., vicar of All Saints, Hatcham, given us the story of her experiences as a bride of Christ for the period of seventeen years, and every man and woman who loves truth and righteousness should thank her for the same. The book may prevent many of our sisters, animated only by the purest motivs and feelings of the most exalted piety, from entering a petty grave, where the wicked do not cease from troubling, and where the weary are by no means at rest. Miss Povey tells her story simply, modestly, and with judicial restraint, and she has found a wise, discreet, and sympathetic editor in the vicar of Hatcham. It turns out that, if ever there was a papal wolf in episcopal sheep's clothing, the Mr. Lynes who masquerades under the name of Father Ignatius is that wolf.

We shall, almost at random and ad aperturam libri, allow Sister Mary Agnes to speak for herself as to her convent experiences. She speaks thus of the morals of monks:

"I hav heard that it was St. Chrysostom who said: 'A monk, by the very nature of the life he leads, is either an angel or a devil;' and I seldom, if ever, knew a monk or boy, a girl or woman, who, sooner or later, did not turn into something which is far removed from that which is angelic, though at their entrance into that name of 'Pax' they were, to all appearances, 'perfect saints.'"

The breakage of domestic utensils in a convent seems to be visited with a strange mixture of the punitiv and the ridiculous. Quoth Sister Mary Agnes:

"If we broke any article, or put it to an improper use, the penance consisted in placing the said article, or piece of it, upon the head. Unfortunately for me, I was famous for breaking machine needles, and consequently I had to balance them on the top of my head, which was no easy matter.

"Again, should we carelessly leave anything out of its proper place, we had to wear that thing the whole of that day. On two or three occasions I hav been adorned with a pail; I hav had a brush and dustpan round my waist, and a large coil of clothes-line round my neck."

And thus the sister expresses herself, re the vow of chastity:

"The vow of chastity is broken by allowing any part of the arm to be seen above the wrist; so that, if we should be engaged in cleaning furniture, or scrubbing floors, or washing clothes, we are not allowed to turn up our sleeves; and, as the undergarments are made of coarse serge with long sleeves, which are only changed once a fortnight throughout summer and winter, the discomfort of this may easily be imagined. However, the feet may be quite bare all the year round, for those of us at least who were considered strong enough, as it is quite in accordance with the vow of holy poverty to go without socks, stockings, or sandals.

"St. Benedict, in order to overcome temptations to break his vow of chastity, is said to hav jumped into a bed of thorns and briars. I thought I would be before him, and prevent evil thoughts even presenting themselvs, so I obtained permission to sting myself with stinging nettles twice a week, and continued to do so for years, though it hurt me dreadfully for two days after the operation."

If you should tamper with any lass who has taken the black veil look out:

"Should anyone attempt to draw aside this present virgin, let him be cursed in his rising up and sitting down, in his standing or walking, in sleeping or waking, in eating or drinking, etc., etc., and may his flesh rot from his bones, and may he be blotted out of the book of life. Amen, amen, so be it."

You are expected to see what does not exist:

"There is supposed to be a miraculous light over the 'altar,' which was pointed out to us on the first day of our arrival at Llanthony. I looked for a long time, but failed to see anything but the sunshine. At last the reverend father said: 'Do you see it, Sister Agnes?'

"I replied, 'No, dear father, I do not see anything but cobwebs and sunshine.'"

If you enter a convent (a Church of England convent, mark you), you are liable to become a door-mat for Christ's sake:

"I must not omit to write on a very distressing subject, and that is the ill treatment I received from the lady prioress. After I had been about a week at Llanthony she sent for me. On coming into her presence I knelt at her feet, and she gave me the hem of her dress to kiss. It should be remembered that we were not usually allowed to speak to the superior without first prostrating our faces to the ground and kissing the hem of her 'holy habit.' But I had better giv the very words of the rule: 'To receive the words of our superior, humbly kneeling, with eyes fixed on the ground.' Should we break this rule the order was 'to receive any penance our superior liked to inflict.'

"My superior on this occasion said: 'Sister Agnes, you often say you wish to submit to me.'

"I replied: 'Yes, dear mother.'

"On which she said: 'Hold your tongue and listen to me, for now I am going to prove you, and the first thing, before I say any more, I must ask you to take off your scapular, for you are not fit to wear it.'

"You, my readers, must please understand that to giv up the scapular was a terrible disgrace, and it quite cut any sister off from many privileges which are highly prized, such as communion and recreation. She now imposed a severe penance upon me. I had to become a door-mat; that is, I had to lie prostrate in front of the church door, so that nuns, girls, monks, and boys should walk over me, and I was not allowed to get up until the last one had entered the church. I did not mind the nuns and girls treading upon me, but my nature did recoil from lying down for men to walk over me. They themselvs hesitated a moment, and then deliberately walked over me. They were under obedience, and, had they refused, would hav incurred punishment. This penance was to last seven times a day for a week. The next penance she imposed was to make me lie prostrate on my face in front of my stall for a week during the night office, which lasts from 2 A.M. to 3:45 A.M. Then a third penance I had to undergo was to be deprived of my breakfast, and thus to go without food till 12 30 P.M.; and, when I was permitted to eat, I remember I had to take my plate and kneel before each sister, and beg food from each in turn."

In a Church of England convent you are liable to hav the devil enter you, and to hav him flogged out with a flail:

"One day I was coming from Nones at 2 45 P.M. This 'mother' commanded me to stay where I was, and not to return to work, and then said: 'You hav got the devil in you and I am going to beat him out.'

"All left the sacristy but myself, the mother superior, and one nun, who was ordered to be present at the casting out of the devil. I was commanded first to strip. I saw the 'disciplin,' with its seven lashes of knotted whip-cord, in her hand, and I knew that one lash given (or taken by one's self) was in reality seven. I should mention that at certain times it was the rule to disciplin one's self.

"Now, my first thought, when commanded to strip, was 'I can't;' it would not be right or modest to strip (it meant to the waist). Then it came into my mind that Jesus did not thus think when the soldiers ordered him to strip to be scourged. He simply obeyed, and I felt sure that what he did I might imitate. So I said inwardly, 'Yes, dear Lord, for love of thee I can.' Then I began to undress, but when I came to my vest shame again overcame me.

"'Take that thing off,' said the mother superior.

"I replied: 'I cannot, reverend mother; it is too tight.'

"The nun who was present was told to help me to get it off. A deep feeling of shame came over me at being half nude.

"The mother then ordered the nun to say the Miserere, and while it was recited she lashed me several times with all her strength. I was determined not to utter a sound, but at last I could not restrain a smothered groan, whereat she gave me one last and cruel lash, and then ceased.

"Even three weeks after she had 'disciplined' me I had a very sore back, and it hurt me greatly to lie on it (our beds were straw, put into sacks).

"There was a looking-glass in the room I now occupied (nuns do not usually hav them), and I looked to see if my back was marked, as it was sore. Never shall I forget the shock it gave me. I turned quickly away, for my back was black, blue, and green all over."

Besides becoming the "bride of Christ" you become his cinder-wench:

"On Ash Wednesday we had nothing to eat or drink until six o'clock in the evening; we stayed in church practically the whole of the day. The floor of the church is strewn with ashes and cinders from the grates, and we sit on the ground in the ashes instead of in our stalls. The six o'clock meal is scarcely touched, as everyone is feeling too cold and ill to eat. After compline we hav to lash ourselvs with the 'disciplin,' and then we hav to go to bed unwashed as a penance for our sins. We are not even allowed to shake the ashes out of our serge habits before retiring for the night; to do so would be to break solemn silence, so we actually sit in ashes all day and sleep in them all night. On Good Friday we go through a somewhat similar day, but the ashes are dispensed with. Every day, over and above the divine office of prayer, continual supplication for the conversion of sinners, and for the dead, are offered, each person taking an hour's watch before the reserved sacrament, so that the church is not left from 5 A.M. till 10 or 11 P.M."

All who are interested in knowing how Anglican Ritualism borrows the livery of the Church of England to serve the scarlet lady of the Seven Hills in should read this revelation of these latter days by ex-Sister Mary Agnes, O.S.B.

Books, like conversation, rarely giv us any precise ideas: nothing is so common as to read and converse unprofitably. We must here repeat what Locke has so strongly urged—Define your terms. A jurisconsult, in his criminal institute, announces that the non-observance of Sundays and holidays is treason against the Divine Majesty. Treason against the Divine Majesty givs an idea of the most enormous of crimes, and the most dreadful of chastisements. But what constitutes the offense? To hav missed vespers. . . . In all disputes on liberty, one reasoner generally understands one thing, and his adversary another. A third comes in who understands neither the one nor the other, nor is himself understood. In these disputes, one has in his head the power of acting; a second, the power of willing; a third, the desire of executing. Each revolves in his own circle, and they never meet.—Voltaire.

A Sensible Decision.

The daily press reports a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois which is of great interest to Infidels. It is that a man cannot be excluded from the witness-stand in that state by reason of his religious disbelief.

The witness in the case under review had declared that he believed in the existence of a God and a hereafter; he felt that if he swore falsely he would be punished under the law of the state, but had never thought seriously whether he would be punished in this world or the next by a supreme being. In other words, he did not seem to recognize his accountability to providence in this matter.

Objection was urged to his testifying on the ground that a witness must not only believe in the existence of a deity, but also that he will punish anyone who givs false testimony.

The supreme court overrules the objection and holds the witness competent. He would not hav been competent, it remarks, prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1870. That declares that "no person shall be denied any civil or political right, privilege or capacity on account of his religious opinions."

The effect of this, the court says, is "to abrogate the rule which obtained in this state prior to the constitution of 1870. There is no longer any test or qualification in respect to religious opinion or belief, or want of the same, which affects the competency of citizens to testify as witnesses in courts of justice."

When the constitution of 1870 was under consideration Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll was a resident of Illinois and took part in formulating the organic law. The Infidels of that state are indebted to him for the privilege of testifying in their courts.

A Country of the Church.

On the nation of Guatemala, now engaged in a bloody war, Dr. G. W. Bock, just arrived in the United States from that disturbed land, givs information as follows:

"You people here hav no conception of the general state of affairs down there. Take for instance our politics and public officers. The people are supposed to elect the officers and hav something to say about the government, but they don't. That is, the poor people don't. When a man gets into office his only thought is to get rich at the expense of the classes, and this they all proceed to do in a calm and determined way."

We desire to hav it noted that the land where this state of public honesty prevails is a thoroughly Christian one. It swarms with priests, and the Freethought that so largely influences conduct and affairs in Germany, Italy, France, England, and the United States is there almost unknown.

"These conditions could not exist, of course, were the people educated and calculated to look after themselvs. The people are not civilized."

The people are not "educated," not "calculated to look after themselvs," not "civilized;" yet they hav been under the care of ecclesiastics for generations. If Christianity is capable of working any good effects, here is where we may certainly expect to find them—and what do we find?

"I can refer you to statistics which will show that seventy per cent of the children in the city of Guatemala are born out of wedlock. The masses do not marry and do not care to marry. In Villa Neuva, another town in Guatemala, the per cent of such children is ninety-four."

Such is everywhere the effect of unmixed church rule on sexual morality.

"The rich and educated of course find little difficulty in victimizing and ruling such subjects, and they do so, you may rest assured. Were it not that among the higher classes there is occasionally some dissension you would never hear from the other element. That is the trouble now. Jealousy and selfishness on the part of those who want to rule is the cause of the disturbance. In other words, it is a chance to make more money and all hands are eager to get a finger in the pie. It is to be seen who will come out on top."

Quite of this nature hav been all the wars and rebellions in completely Christian countries. They hav never been for an improvement, a reform. A century ago France and America were fortunate enough to catch a glimmering of the light of intelligence, and in the ensuing wars there was a striving for principles of truth and betterment—for secularism and republicanism. Previous to that time, the whole catalog of European hostility exhibits no other cause of conflict than an insane difference over unmeaning dogmas, or, as in the present case, a dispute for gain between greedy rivals.

Our Literary Censors.

A cranky old Russian, called Count Tolstoi, who some time ago furnished the basis for a society "fad" by advocating a return to primitiv Christianity, the father of nine children and husband of a wife who takes care of him, mistaking the impotency of old age for a new growth of virtue, has written a book disparaging woman and inculcating celibacy, and our Anarchist friend B. R. Tucker has translated and published it, and our Christian postmaster-general has forbidden it the privilege of the mail on the ground that it is obscene. Rumor hath it, however, that the prohibition was not laid on till the Wanamaker firm in Philadelphia had vainly endeavored to obtain copies from Mr. Tucker at a very low price. Be this as it may, the prohibition has sent the sale up several thousands, and a very worthless book has been lifted into notoriety.

Of the book itself there is nothing good to be said. It is the outcome of a pessimism engendered by taking Christ's teaching literally, stamped into a man's nature by a reckless use of his powers, and emphasized by a late repentance. To Tolstoi romantic love is intemperance. The tender passion that has from all time been the theme of the poet and the novelist he deems a species of moral depravity, on a par with gluttony, the smoking of opium, or indulgence in strong drink. A person finding himself, or herself, in love should fight against it as against the opium habit or any other pernicious thing. Cupid is the devil in his most awful guise. Felix Oswald has shown how Christianity produces such states of mind, and this book is pretty fair evidence of the truth of his analyses of the Galilean ascetic's religion. It is rarely that we can agree with the religious Independent, but that journal tells the truth when it says that the man who wrote the piece of maudlin raving must be "a madman, or one who without conscience set himself the task of deliberately outraging decency. From beginning to end it is a parody on Zola's dirtiest conceits, a libel on human nature, and an affront to honest manhood and womanhood the world over. There is not a ray, not a spark of the sweet light of conscience—not a breath of tenderness, not a throb of human love (save the brutal, beastly love of the roué and the blackguard) in it anywhere. Moreover it is bald, devoid of art, and without any special reason for being." That is a pretty hard criticism for a religious journal to pass upon a book which is as closely related to, and as directly the outcome of, its religion as a child to and of its parents, but it is the truth; and however false the teaching of the book, however outrageous its views of marriage, Christianity must bear the blame. Were Tolstoi not a Christian—and much nearer Christ than the Independent is—the book had been less inhuman.

It is well, however, that the book is what it is, for our pious officials hav found it obscene. The post-office authority, to whom was submitted a copy, says: "After a careful examination of this publication, I am of the opinion that it is of an 'indecent character,' hence it is forbidden circulation in the mails by the act approved Sept. 26, 1888." But Mr. Tucker differs from the post-office people in this. He says "it is simply another, and this time a very audacious step on the part of the vice suppression (so-called) cranks in the direction of muzzling the freedom of the press. I can assure these people of one thing—they will never suppress the book without a bitter fight, and in this fight I believe I shall hav the aid and sympathy of every broad-minded literary man in the world. Objectionable as the Comstock law is, I do not believe that it can be made to cover the 'Kreutzer Sonata,' and I believe that the official who shall try to make it cover it by his own arbitrary act will lay himself liable to a suit for heavy damages."

According to the Evening Post, Anthony Comstock has no hand in the suppression, but now that his attention has been called to it he may see fit in his omnipotent omniscience to proceed against the publisher. However, his competitor, Jo Britton, who has learned the trade and set up for himself, has taken part in the suppressing business, and added several other books to the index expurgatorius. Britton, it will be remembered, was once the right-hand man of Comstock, but the two worthies parted because of difference of opinion. Whether this difference was financial or not we can only suspect. Britton went into the diamond trade, and also in company with Dr. R. A. Gunn hoisted upon the market a "microbe killer." Dr. Gunn was, and perhaps is, a member of the Manhattan Liberal Club; he was for several years a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and might be now but that patience with him ceased to be a virtue many moons ago. He is now president of Britton's society. When the pious Wanamaker's department sat down upon the "Kreutzer Sonata," Britton saw a chance to also acquire fame. He went round to the American News Company's headquarters, and bought a dozen different novels. He decided that five of them were obscene. They were entitled, "Thou Shalt Not," "Speaking of Ellen," "In Stella's Shadow," "An Actor's Wife," and "The Devil's Daughter." Britton then went before Justice Murray at the Tombs and swore that the American News Company was selling immoral books. He got warrants for the arrest of the clerks who had sold him the copies, and a search warrant to enable him to seize all immoral books on the premises. Manager Patrick Farrelly of the News Company is reported as being greatly astonished when the warrants arrived, but said he was quite ready to turn over all the books that Britton considered immoral. Mr. Farrelly was escorted around to the police court with two clerks. A half-dozen employees of the News Company, by Manager Farrelly's orders, brought out all the copies of the books mentioned which were to be found in stock, and stacked them in a big pile on one of the counters. Many of the books were brought from the shipping department, where they were packed in cases for out-of-town orders. An inventory was made, which showed that 1,244 books were in the pile. A few copies of the "Kreutzer Sonata" and 100 copies of "The Clemenceau Case" were added to the others. An Italian junk wagon was hired to cart the books up to the Tombs, where they were stored. In the afternoon the lawyer for the News Company said that his clients were simply acting as booksellers and not publishers, and that they were quite ready to stop the sale at once of all books which could be shown to be of an objectionable nature. Mr. Britton was seen at his house by a Herald reporter, and he said that "Dr. Gunn has read all of these books complained of, and they are totally unfit to be publicly sold where they can fall into the hands of innocent young people. We hav been preparing for this raid for some days, and intend to follow it up until the sale of such literature is suppressed in this city."

The arrest of Mr. Farrelly and his clerks is another unkind cut at Christians. Mr. Farrelly is a bigoted Roman Catholic who hates THE TRUTH SEEKER and does all he can to discourage its sale, going so far as to report it "dead," and refusing to fill orders for it. One of the chief employees of the company once told us that he was sorry to see a single copy of our books sold, for they "demoralized" the people who read them.

The books seized by Britton are trashy fiction, with the exception, perhaps, of "Speaking of Ellen," and it is of no consequence whether they are read or not. But labeling them "obscene" is a good way to increase their circulation, and Britton may reasonably ask the publishers for a round sum for the advertisment he has given them.

The action of the post-office department and Britton would be ludicrous in these cases were it not so serious a violation of the rights to which American citizens are entitled. None of these books is obscene. The "Kreutzer Sonata" is unobjectionable in its language, as might be expected from so finished a scholar as Mr. Tucker. Its ideas are gross, but that is due to the Christianity of its author and not to the translator. The books so tamely surrendered by Patrick Farrelly, Roman Catholic, are like hundreds of other works of fiction; there is no real obscenity in them. The danger from them is the unwarrantable act they hav induced a professional suppressor to commit. There are vastly deeper questions involved than the circulation of these works, and these are: Shall the people tolerate a self-established literary censorship? and shall the freedom of the press be limited by the notions of these self-elected censors?

There can be but one answer to these questions, and that a negativ one. Freedom of speech and of the press are the bulwarks of American liberty. Freedom of the mails is vital to each, and an irresponsible censorship with power to suppress books at will, destroys freedom of speech and of the press. With a man like Wanamaker at the head of the post-office and fellows like Britton and Comstock suppressing books at their own discretion, the people are slaves to a censorship as despotic and damnable as that exercised by the officials of Russia.

Perhaps the worst feature of this outrageous censorship is its arbitrariness and irresponsibility. No legal tribunal, no authority recognized by the people, has pronounced the books obscene. Three men hav presumed to dictate to sixty-five millions. And what self-respecting individual cares for the opinions of Britton and Gunn! As for Tyner, the post-office lawyer, what is his judgment worth? He says, "I regard the 'Kreutzer Sonata' as an indecent publication," and the post-office is closed against the book. If the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER were in Tyner's place he would say, "I regard the Holy Scriptures of the Christians as an indecent book," and out would go the Bible! A New England deacon would throw out Shelley and Shakspere and Byron, and dozens of other works. A Protestant with the courage of his convictions would bar Catholic works, and a Catholic who dared would bar the sermons of preachers like Fulton. If this censorship is allowed and its possibilities carried out we shall hav a fine state of things, and liberty will be—where? In the keeping of unread bigots and unscrupulous adventurers. The Herald warningly says, commenting on the arrest of Farrelly: "We hav had too much of this meddling business—rummaging the mails for the books of a conscientious writer like Tolstoi, suppressing the poems of one of the gentlest and noblest of writers, Whitman, and now taking a gentleman to the Tombs for having on his shelves a copy of Balzac. American readers are not children, idiots, or slaves. They can govern their reading without the advice of Mr. Comstock, Mr. Wanamaker, or this new supervisor of morals named Britton—a kind of spawn from Comstock, we are informed, and who begins his campaign for notoriety by an outrage upon Mr. Farrelly."

This matter has been traversed at length in these columns, and time and again hav we warned the publishers that tame submission to these outrages would lead to still greater exactions. The present suppressions seem to us to be the straw which should strain the poor beast's back and induce him to protest vigorously. If this is not done, the publishers will all be at the mercy of bigots and blackmailers.

Religion a Source of Dissension.

Besides the cruel persecution of the Jews by Russian Christians that is in progress; besides the sectarian enmity in Canada whose smouldering from time to time breaks out in flames of personal violence; besides the periodical riots in Ireland, and besides all the other current instances of religious generation of hostility that we hav no space to enumerate, the following cases offer themselvs as present examples of the disruptiv effect of supernatural beliefs:

"MIDDLETOWN, CONN., July 20.—Connecticut Catholics do not like the Rev. Mr. Schofield, of Higganum, a country village on the Connecticut River, because, in a seething oration at the picnic of the American Mechanics on July 4th, he assailed the Catholic religion in tempestuous style. So the Catholics of Rocky Hill, a neighboring village, got together the other night, and burnt him in effigy. They rigged up a cloth and paper dummy, formed a procession around it, and with cheers and hisses marched to a lonely spot in the suburbs and touched fire to it. It had been saturated with kerosene, and blazed brilliantly. Amid groans and hisses the effigy went up in flame and smoke."

Not long ago the angry devotees would hav burnt not in effigy but in flesh this man who dared to tell some truth about their religion.

"The closing exercises of School District No. 1, in Bay Shore, L. I., were held on Friday afternoon, and Principal Enos Wood invited the Rev. Charles H. Schultz, rector of St. Peter's Episcopal church, to open the ceremonies with a prayer. He started to perform this service when he was informed by the board of education that out of deference to the wishes of the Rev. James E. Benbier, the pastor of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church, he would not be allowed to pray. He was requested to make a few remarks, which he declined to do. As a large proportion of the taxes in the district are paid by Episcopalians, including such men as Henry B. Hyde, Frank C. Lawrence, Bradish Johnson, of Louisiana, and the estates of John I. Lawrence and Bethuel Phelps, this step on the part of the trustees of the district has raised a storm of indignation."

Between these contending denominations, equally blind and equally despiteful, our public schools are always in danger of going down, unless upheld by vigilant and resolute efforts of the enlightened portion of the Americans.

The list closes with advices from Constantinople of conflicts in the neighborhood, in which Christians and Mohammedans vie in demonstration of their holy rage. At a riot in a Constantinople cathedral—

"Military assistance was asked for to quell the disturbance. A body of Turkish troops were sent for to restore order, but when they entered the cathedral they met with desperate resistance. The mob was armed with revolvers and spiked staves and a bloody conflict ensued between them and the troops. Four of the soldiers and three of the rioters were killed and others were injured before the mob was driven from the building. . . .

"In Erzeroum, where recently a hundred Christians were slain in the church, a state of panic prevails owing to the threatening attitude of the Mussulman population and the excesses of the troops. Hardly a day passes, says a correspondent, but wounded persons are brought in from the surrounding districts. In Erzeroum itself persons disappear, and no one knows whither, and dead bodies are constantly found within and without the walls. . . .

"The profanation of the Armenian church at the time by the troops rankles in the minds of all the Christians. The porte has threatened to proclaim martial law in Armenia. The general opinion is that if this is done Christian Armenians will be mercilessly crushed and their cause irretrievably lost. . . .

"The sultan's secretary has ordered the Armenian patriarch to send a circular to the churches advising the people to abstain from demonstrations. The patriarch in the future will be held responsible for disorders like those that occurred in the cathedral, and will be considered an accomplice of the rioters. The patriarch was also ordered to address a letter to the sultan asking that severe punishment be inflicted upon the rioters who are held for trial, and expressing his gratitude for the aid rendered by Turkish soldiers in quelling the disturbance in the cathedral."

A Prefigurement.

The Board of Regents of the New York State University has decided to issue charters to five Catholic institutions which hav applied for membership in the establishment. The law requires that academies, in order to become members of the state system of education and to share in the distribution of the academic fund of $100,000 annually, must hold a certain amount of property, and hav a library and certain apparatus. A committee of the regents considered the matter of the application of the St. John's Roman Catholic Academy of Syracuse. St. John's church and the Roman Catholic bishop of that see finally agreed to issue to the board of trustees of that school an absolute lease of the property for fifty years. The committee of the Board reported that the lease perfectly met all the legal conditions and requirements, and the charter was thereupon issued. The application of five other Roman Catholic schools in various parts of the state was subjected to the same procedure. In time, all of such schools in this state will become members of the State University by the operation of this system.

The New York Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic paper, thus comments: "What this prefigures is the fact that, in time, the primary parochial schools will be taken into the state system on an equitable basis."

When the public school funds are divided between the sects, and all the children by law turned over to the various churches to be made ignorant, the orthodox Christians will be truly happy.

An Honest Church Corporation.

"The Jarvis Street Baptist church in Toronto, Canada, recently adopted a resolution declaring its protest 'against the exemption of church property from municipal taxes, as being contrary to the principles which ought to regulate the relation of the state to all ecclesiastical bodies,' and respectfully urging the corporation of Toronto 'to use its influence to secure the abolition of such exemption;' and further requesting the corporation 'to assess the property of Jarvis Street Presbyterian church, and giv notice of such assessment to the clerk of the church, as in the case of other rate-payers.'"

The above paragraph is taken from the Christian Statesman, where it is followed by an argument in favor of church exemption, the nub of which is that "if the property is truly held and used for the public good, let it be exempted; if it is for private emolument or advantage, let it be taxed." Of course this argument is fallacious, for who shall say what is for the public good, and who shall hav the hardihood to aver that churches are really used by the public?

But we desire to congratulate the Jarvis Street Baptist church, and to blazon its honesty to the world. We trust, moreover, that its repentance at this time is not from any jealousy because its Roman Catholic rivals own more real estate in Toronto than do the Presbyterians.

Do Away With the Death Penalty.

The cruelty attending the execution of murderer Kemmler by electricity and the frightful uncertainty attending the application of that form of the death penalty will not be without benefit to the people of the state of New York if it shall induce our legislators to abolish the death penalty entirely and substitute imprisonment for life, or until the murderer shall be deemed fit to again go at large.

Hanging is a barbarous method of killing a man, and its abolition was brought about by an awakened public sentiment against brutality. We trust it will not again be made legal.

The object of punishment is now generally conceded to be the reformation of the criminal, not revenge for the crime he has committed. Dead men cannot reform, and their taking off brutalizes the community, the men who commit the legal murder, and does not restrain others from murdering. Let the death penalty be abolished.

A Chance for All.

A friend who writes not for publication, and whose name is therefore necessarily withheld, says:

"It does not seem necessary to Freethought to defend obscenity or polygamy. Some of your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER are of questionable propriety on those subjects."

If this friend, or any other, will point out one sentence written by the Editor of this paper defending obscenity or polygamy, the Editor will make him a present of a nice new suit of clothes beside which Joseph's garment was but a bundle of rags.

"WHAT Would Follow the Effacement of Christianity?" by George Jacob Holyoake (10 cents; 12 copies for $1), is an indictment of Christianity that Freethinkers should read, and then circulate around the neighborhood.

THERE ought to be in this city a Society for the Suppression of "suppression," "prevention," and "enforcement" societies. They are a pestiferous lot, composed of bigots and unprincipled adventurers. The adventurers use the bigots and line their own pockets.

ALDEN HALE is informed that we cannot use his manuscript, nor return it, as he failed to attach his address to it. "Diagoras" will please forward his name and address, or his well-written article will go into the wastebasket. Charles Laperche will find the price-list of indulgences in D. M. Bennett's "Champions of the Church" (page 421), taken from De Cormenin's "History of the Popes," vol. ii, page 54.

MR. EDITOR: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th, not come to hand. I want to read all the pictures. The "Patriarchs" are done to perfection. Why not enlarge them, and print colored lithographs for framing?

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money for the picture book. When I sent my own and my friend's subscription we voted for the pictures, but I did not see the votes recorded in THE TRUTH SEEKER. May THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble family and Brother Heston liv long and prosper, is the prayer of this nest of ungodly Atheists.

WILLIAM THORPE.

HANNIBAL, Mo., July 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Death, the destroyer of all, called at the home of our brother July 10, 1890, at Canton, Mo. Brother A. Dittwiler, at the age of seventy years, left this world of care. He has been during life an outspoken Freethinker, and his request was that his remains be laid at rest under the auspices of the Brotherhood of Moralists, of which order he was one of the earliest members. I, as secretary of the order, officiated, using the beautiful ritual of Dr. A. R. Ayres. The deceased brother must hav been respected in his town; a large following to the grave attested this. Among the sorrowing friends and neighbors were six ministers of the cloth.

MR. EDITOR: I see a communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 19th inst. from Wyoming, by Dr. Boynton. I think, as he does, that there are people willing to take the spiritual, as well as many other ideas, without understanding proofs. Is it not just as likely the disease will prevent persons understanding the spiritual thought as the reverse? Now, after traveling thousands of miles for the purpose of studying psychical subjects, for fifty years, I hav determined in my mind for the present that spirit or electricity in man is the agent that moves, and givs form to the body, and is the all. When persons leave the body they hav the same magnetic power as they had before leaving, and become either gods or devils. All the evidence that has come to man since memory began, that is understood, is the proof.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a petition for pardon of Moses Harman. I received several blanks from you, and hav succeeded in having one filled. I hav sent several blanks to other parties to hav filled, and will forward them as soon as they are returned. I am forty years old; was raised by Christian parents, and believed in the hocus-pocus until about three years ago, when I undertook to study the Holy Queer for myself, when I found it to be a fraud, filled with contradictions and absurdities, so unreasonable that I could no longer believe in it, though it was like pulling my eye teeth to giv it up. We hav a large sprinkling of Freethinkers in this part, and are not ashamed to let ourselvs be known. We hav our monthly meetings, and invite the clergy out to criticise us, but they make themselvs scarce. We are on top, and mean to stay there. Keep Heston at work. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER. GEO. W. SOOBER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I can hardly avoid complimenting you upon the improved appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it is with considerable reluctance I allow it to go out of my possession, fearful of never seeing my copy again. You are aware I am a Spiritualist, as also a Materialist. This fact I should like fully understood. I hav been so for many years past. I scorn the idea of hypocritically attempting to ride two horses at once. Some of your readers wonder how this can be done. It is very plain; perhaps I hav had more spiritual proofs than circumstances hav permitted others.

A Spiritual friend recently called upon me and said he had once been a devout, praying Methodist, and to become an enlightened Spiritualist one must hav had a good schooling in Atheism.

I like THE TRUTH SEEKER because it is conservativ to no sect or party, but only to that of decorum, delicacy, and truth.

CINCINNATI, O., July 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a constant reader of your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and like it very much. I get it from the local agent. I am a Scotchman, and came to America only about one year ago. I used to read the English Freethought papers, but I believe THE TRUTH SEEKER excels them. The illustrations to my mind could not be surpassed. There does not appear to be any Freethought society in this city; at least I can discover no trace of any—which does appear strange. I am acquainted with one or two Liberals in this city, but not sufficiently to form a society, though probably we may manage to get a few more together before winter. We started a Freethought society in Edinburgh, Scotland, just a little while before I left the country. It appears to be doing well enough. There is not enough of local talent at present here to keep a society organized even if we could get a start. Possibly other branches could help us out a little, and if we could get a good lecturer to come at the start maybe we might organize, but it will depend upon whether we can get more Liberal acquaintances. The church here does not appear to hav very much power, and I believe, with a good start, we could do some good for the cause of truth and advancement. It is my earnest desire to do something for Freethought. All my Liberal acquaintances are Scotchmen, which is another objection to organizing. If we make any definit arrangements we will communicate with you as to getting a lecturer. If you can giv me the names of any Liberals in this city that would be likely to join us I would be much obliged.

Yours truly, ANDREW HOGG.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read "My Religious Experience," by S. P. Putnam, and I feel as if I want every Liberal in the land to read it and lend it to his neighbor. It is a vivid picture of a real religious conversion, and the coming out of it again into the clear light of truth and reason. It is as interesting as a novel, and as entrancing as only such an autobiography can be. Thoughts, feelings, opinions, and facts are thoroughly analyzed in Putnam's own clear, poetical, practical, earnest manner, and you follow him in his course as wrapped up in the narrativ as if it were your own individual story laid bare to your view. Like his "Gottlieb" or "Love Triumphant," it fills you with such a love of truth, humanity, beauty, and lofty purpose that you feel enthusedly and earnestly converted to a higher life as you close up the little volume, and sigh because there is not more of it.

MR. EDITOR: Before I will answer any of G. A. Chapin's questions allow me to ask kindly of G. A. Chapin what evidence he can furnish that no God exists, and that any man has authority over another rightfully?

I should also like to know why majority rule is more destructiv than the rule of a monarch. If so, why so?

If a person holds titles to vacant land without using the same, if it is wrong, why so?

If one man, or a combination of men, monopolize the issue of money, if it is wrong, why so?

I should like to know upon what ground compulsory taxation can be enforced on property.

Are interest, rent, and profits earned by the receiver? If not, why not? Is it honest to believe the collection thereof to be wrong? If so, why so?

What good is there in a policeman's allowing a man to kill another and using no force in arresting the murderer?

Respectfully, AUGUST BUESING.

INDIAN GROVE, July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: John W. Dayton, of Attumway, says: "I hav often wondered why Freethinkers thought it incumbent on them to defend, by influence and money, those guilty of sending obscene literature through the mails." In this connection he propounds this very pertinent question: "In advocating the principles of Liberalism is it necessary to sink into the depths of obscenity?" He says, "I think not." And so say I. In this particular I flatter myself that I am in perfect accord with nine-tenths of all Freethinking people throughout the country. Our postal laws were framed by our legal representativs, and they certainly voiced the sentiments of their constituency when they declared by legal enactment that no obscene literature should be disseminated through the United States mail. The march of intelligence and civilization has expunged from our nomenclature the slang phraseology and the indecent, vulgar terms that characterized the literature of a few centuries ago. A pure, chaste literature, treating on all subjects that interest the scientific mind, is disseminated without let or hindrance through the United States mail, and there is therefore not the slightest apology for such men as Harman, Heywood, and company, who, in direct violation of statutory enactment, persist in circulating through the mails a class of literature that has a strong tendency to corrupt and deprave that inherent love of purity and moral and intellectual refinement that is so preëminently characteristic of the present age, and upon which to a great extent depends the renovation of society and the stamping out of vice and immorality in the land. There is not, looking at the subject from an unbiased standpoint, a solitary extenuating circumstance in the case. It is to me a humiliating and much to be regretted fact that almost all newspaper exponents of Freethought are circulating petitions and soliciting substantial aid in behalf and in vindication of those strangely infatuated and misguided men. While we sympathize with them in their dire misfortune we remember that it is only through the experience of the ills contingent on the violation of the principles of justice and morality that we may become wise. Could not our brilliant R. G. Ingersoll assign as plausible a reason for the discontinuance of his patronage of those journals that are making such strenuous efforts and such touching appeals in behalf of Harman, Heywood, and company as he assigned for disconnecting himself with the Liberal League? The action of prominent Freethought journals and Liberal organizations in connection with the Harman, Heywood, and Reid case is positivly destructiv to the cause we hold so dear. It is a retrograde movement instead of an advance one, that will cause Liberalism to become a hiss and a by-word simultaneously with a shout of allelujah and exultant triumph from the orthodox camp. The best arguments employed in defense of the principles advocated and defended by Liberals, emanating from the most brilliant orators and writers, hav been couched in words so chaste and pure as to giv no offense to the most fastidiously inclined, and all must recognize their superiority in moral tone and intellectual refinement over the dirt, drivel, and filth that characterize the pages of holy writ. This article will doubtless meet with adverse criticism on account of our inclination to discriminate against superstition and vice, but we hold it to be the imperativ duty of every man to boldly and fearlessly investigate all questions affecting his present or future welfare and decide for himself independent of popular opinion or prejudice.

W. E. WALTON.

ROCHESTER, MINN., July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you allow a few friendly criticisms? I was greatly interested in the last TRUTH SEEKER—firstly, by reading "Proslavery Discussions of American Ministers," knowing with what tenacity they sustained negro slavery. They would not patronize any antislavery papers, nor circulate them, just the same as some goody-good people now refuse to read or look at such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Lucifer, Word, etc. "The domestic relations of master and slave" must not be interfered with then, any more than the domestic relations of husbands and wives (master and slaves) must be interfered with now, even when the crime of enforced maternity issues from every six out of ten health-broken women. Now, to know that slavery was upheld fifty-five years ago, and then to find the very same sentiments uttered by our Freethinkers to-day, seems miraculous! Turn to the article of Mr. C. Close and extracts from Colonel Ingersoll. They both, evidently, throttle free speech and freedom of thought, by their writings, in sustaining the Comstock law, which has jailed so many noble-minded workers for unpopular reforms. I ask, must all accept as infallible what Colonel Ingersoll discerns as "literature of immorality," any more than what Comstock or the various judges may discern as such? I, as a woman, wife, and mother, everlastingly protest against any law which can silence the utterance of advanced ideas of the age. "Our Suffering Sisters" at home need to understand the laws of life better, but if all who attempt to teach them are silenced by prison bars, it seems that "The Strike of a Sex" will become a necessity, as well as a readable work of fiction.

Mr. Close says: "Those men [Harman, Heywood, Reid] each and all hav promulgated theories and engaged in practices contrary to law." Did not the brave Abolitionists do the same, and time vindicated them? Did they not disobey the Fugitiv Slave law? Did they not suffer death for printing, writing, and talking upon slavery? But we know they were in the right, for tyranny is evil.

Again: "Liberals should point out the evils of existing laws—and there are many—and in every legitimate, proper manner endeavor to hav them amended, or repealed, or better ones substituted." Now, in the name of exact truth, what else hav Harman, Heywood, the Footes, and others been driving at for the last eighteen or more years? They hav tried in every legitimate, proper manner to amend, repeal, or substitute better laws! And herein lies their crime. Simply because the light of investigation revealed more horrid practices than was thought possible, why, these advanced guards must be imprisoned as criminals, with the merest farce of a trial. What of a judge who deals out law in such a manner? It is just such "deals" that compel persons to become Anarchists.

Again: "It is not in accordance with the spirit of Liberalism to even indirectly seem to giv countenance and support to any of the cranky ideas of Anarchists, Socialists, freelovers, or of those who hav extreme and unacceptable ideas of sexual and depraved notions in regard to social and family relations."

Now, must we all accept this narrow, limited kind of Liberalism which friend Close is so anxious to keep free from agitation? Certainly not. Let us investigate all subjects thoughtfully and justly, and don't be afraid of new and cranky ideas. A reform to be permanent must appeal to the reason and intellect of man, and what we "Suffering Sisters" at home demand of you voters is, untrammeled freedom to educate ourselvs. And that means that you must not kill off or jail our teachers through any such (l)awful laws as now exist.

Yours for free speech when you've something to say,

FLORA W. FOX.

CENTENNIAL STATE, July 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Our hearts are filled with sorrow. Every time when we feel consoled to hav a good sky-pilot in any Western community to lead us along the narrow path, along comes some officer with a star hanging on his old torn vest, and arrests our Lord's embassadors, and swears charges against the workers in the holy vineyard. I am sure the Lord has put a lying spirit into the mouths of the multitude, as he said he would in holy writ, and sure nobody would dare to accuse the Lord for not keeping word in the face of our gospel-building Missouri Freemasons and holy John Wanamaker as a piratical publisher of the Encyclopedia Britannica, unauthorized to do so except under cover of piracy. But see what the lying telegraph, in the mouths of multitudes, says: At Fort Worth, Tex., they arrested the Rev. Brother William Mitchell, the leading gospel-pounder of the burg. Five leading banks charge brother Mitchell with forgery, when, as a matter of fact, the reverend brother meant all well—to build up the Lord's kingdom. Of course it takes money to make the mare go in church as well as on the racetrack. Not content with the injury they hav already done against the brother's character, they are publishing little anecdotes of the Rev. William Mitchell as having been arrested before, and once caught stealing books, when he only wanted to study the laws of Moses for our benefit.

Now comes La Junta, Col. In order to not be behind other growing Western towns, they arrest the Rev. Mr. Rae, and charge him with obtaining the paltry little sum of $1,800 under false pretenses. Not satisfied with such an outrage against a follower of Jesus, they put the reverend Brother Rae into the Otero county jail, because the Lord has put a lying spirit into the mouths of the multitude. The very people who wanted a free pass to heaven are neglecting to furnish $1,000 bail and get Brother Rae out of jail to preach the wrath to come.

At Granada, Col., the Rev. William Grooms has done a more sensible act. When he found preaching did not pay, owing to a wicked Jacob Blumer, who circulates fifty-two TRUTH SEEKERS annually, he went to Holly station, and took charge of a section on the Santa Fe railroad, and figures in his old following, that of a section boss.

It pains one's heart to observe with how little respect some newspapers speak of our holy sky-pilots. For instance, when the Rev. Bernard Kelly preached that no resubmissionist could be a Christian, the Anthony, Kan., Republican said that there is no law in Kansas prohibiting a preacher from making a fool of himself (but it worked the reverse in the Harman case).

The other day, or rather evening, a Mr. Harris, near Du Quoin, Kan., on his way home from church tumbled out of his buggy and broke his neck, and was as dead as a goose. Yet preachers say no evil can befall one who is going to church. The Mr. Harris in this case is no backslider, but had the reputation as the leading spirit in the Presbyterian church and all Sunday-schools, and yet the Lord must break the poor, honest farmer's neck. Moral: Let church-going on Sunday nights alone. Take neither the preachers' nor the Lord's word for it, for we don't know on which side at the moment the Lord's lying spirit may take possession. Keep him out of politics, schools, courts, and juries, and man will reach justice all the sooner.

Only a short time ago they arrested my old acquaintance, W. A. Spears, in Richardson county, Neb., and charged Brother Spears as being insane, simply because Brother Spears claims that he is the second Prophet Elijah, to bring drouth and famin on earth. And sure enough drouth has prevailed already in many parts. All our lives we are taught how our old Bible friends used to liv, but no sooner, on arriving at our manhood, do we try to imitate our old friends, the Lord's anointed, and those after the Lord's own heart, than we are dragged off to jail, and sent to the lunatic asylum or penitentiary, all because we don't know at the time on which side the multitude is filled with the Lord's lying spirit.

KEMPNER, TEX., July 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a new subscriber to your paper, never having heard of it until I saw your advertisment in the Independent Pulpit, of Waco, Tex., and never having seen a copy until I received it on my trial subscription, which will soon be run out. To say that I like the paper is putting it in the mildest way I know of. I like it in every way; find no fault with it in any way; would know nothing to suggest to make it better, and it is my intention to subscribe for it as long as I can raise the yearly subscription price and as long as THE TRUTH SEEKER maintains its vigorous way of defending and spreading the principles it now so ably advocates. The last, but by far not the least, in my estimation, are the letters you print of our fellow-Liberals from all parts of the Union, and other countries. To a man living, like myself, among heathen Christians, they are company, next to the writers themselvs. They make me forget the loneliness I feel when I consider that I am about the only outspoken Infidel in this community, and feel the looking-down on me of my faithful fellow-citizens. I am living here surrounded by the Dark Ages, as it were, with the instruments of torture and the Holy Inquisition left out. There are shepherds and sheep here for whom and with whom the earth and its progress are standing still, for if the earth was moving with such a tremendous force as some fools want them to believe, would not every tree and mountain be leveled down? If it was not for the Bible a man could not tell himself from a wild hog; or, as another preacher puts it, "If you reject the Bible, how do you know you are not a mule?" He says: "If we throw away the Bible, we would soon turn our wives and fair daughters out on the prairie and treat them like brutes. There is more of astronomy and geology in this chapter [I cannot think of the name of the chapter now] than in all the books that were ever written taken together." If this is not the Dark Ages reproduced in a milder state, or rather if this is not a remnant of that eventless and dead epoch, the Dark Ages, surely then I am sadly mistaken. And how much more than the political power would it take to reinstate the Blue laws of New England and by and by the Holy Inquisition of Spain? If we allow the fanatics to put their holy Bible god (I refuse to put a capital G in that name) into our glorious and well-tried Constitution, and into our schools and school-books, as the keen point of an entering wedge, how soon would they follow with more Sunday laws; how soon would they outlaw all unbelievers; how soon would they commence persecuting them, and afterward one sect the other! How soon would they rend asunder our republic, this glorious work of unbelievers! How soon would they hav the stream muddied and things in a chaos, and the high priest down to the low priest wading in blood, and to the last one of them fishing for the wealth of their dupes!

With pleasure I see that the Liberals of Washington state hav taken stand to repel the entering wedge, God in our schools and in our politics. It is with pleasure I see the Liberals of Texas trying to organize, and there is hope that we will not only succeed in saving our country from the God contagion, but also shake the last vestige of the Dark Ages out of its last hiding-place in our country.

The crop of camp-meetings is a full one, as usual. It never fails. No matter if all other crops are parched up by the heat of the sun and the usual drouth, this one crop is a sure crop; and its accompanying gymnastic contortions of body and mind never miss either. The crop is now in full bloom, and ripening in the usual conversion of members of one sect into another. I hav yet to hear of the conversion of a real unbeliever.

Sending my best regards to all outspoken and activ Infidels through THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain, Yours truly, ARTHUR SCHUBERT.

MAKANDA, ILL., June 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The sentence pronounced by Judge Foster on Mr. Harman is most unreasonable, brutal, unjust, and infamous. It is one that, when the prejudices of the times hav passed away, as they are destined soon to do, will consign him, with Jeffries, to the everlasting scorn and contempt of all the good of earth. To inflict so severe a sentence on an honest, pure-minded, kind-hearted friend of humanity, because in his honest zeal for the cause of an outraged, and almost defenseless, class of his fellow-citizens he erred in judgment and published communications containing language of doubtful propriety, is too gross an outrage on personal and natural rights, and the spirit of our institutions, to be thought of in cold blood. In passing judgment on such unjust, vindictiv, and disgraceful specimens of humanity as Judge Foster and his jury we should, I suppose, pity rather than blame them. We must remember that the Ethiope cannot change his skin nor the leopard his spots; the sow will wallow and snakes must crawl—so a born tyrant, sneak, or knave cannot manifest the essential characteristics of a true, just, and honorable gentleman, whether on the bench or elsewhere. These are the only considerations that palliate the vindictiv and cruel conduct of Judge Foster.

Yet while I speak thus of Judge Foster and his class, I deeply regret that Mr. Harman and Mr. Heywood should deem it their duty to publish language so gross and disgusting as to shock the sense of decency of the great mass of refined and really pure-minded people, both in and out of the ranks of Freethought. One of our serious charges against the Bible is the obscenity of many of its narrativs, sayings, and laws, and if we adopt a similar style of language we cannot consistently press that objection. From the first, Comstock and his reverend henchmen hav made obscenity the principal pretext for their persecution of Freethinkers, while we know that their real war is against Freethought itself. It has seemed to me that, under the circumstances, it was preëminently the dictate of wisdom to avoid even the appearance of evil in this respect. We all know that Comstock and his ghoulish clan of filth-loving, boasted moral scavengers are watching and waiting for a plausible pretext on which to base legal proceedings against us, well knowing that the prevailing bitter Christian prejudice against us and our cause will greatly aid them in the consummation of their tyrannical and infamous purposes, hoping also, by their success, to check the progress of Freethought.

Now, it seems to me that, under the circumstances, a decent respect for the feelings, opinions, convictions, or, if they will hav it so, the prejudices of their fellow-workers in the cause of humanity, ought to deter everyone from even an approach to the borderland of obscenity. The conduct of Mr. Harman and Mr. Heywood, to say the least of it, is of doubtful propriety. It puts us on the defensiv against the filthy charge of obscenity, and, what is the bad feature of the case, it makes the defense difficult and doubtful. When a writer or speaker selects language unnecessarily vulgar and disgusting in describing the vile doings of his fellowmen, we logically conclude that he is not so much opposed to that which is gross and filthy as he should be, and no editor can publish communications in which such language is used without injuring his character, and the cause he advocates, even though the motivs may be perfectly pure. Therefore, I protest against this line of conduct. Those pious prosecutors, however, who defend as divinely inspired the equally obscene passages of the Bible, and insist on having them read by our children in school, only prove themselvs to be inconsistent, contemptible hypocrits.

W. W. WALKER.

MARCELINE, MO., July 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received THE TRUTH SEEKERS all right which you sent me a short time ago. I read them with interest and distributed them with greater interest. I came here to Chariton county, Mo., about a month ago, from Bramble, Ind. My health has been poor for five months, so I came here to visit my uncle in hope of gaining better health while among the Chariton hills. I had only been here a short time when the Holiness people pitched their tent (Tabernacle) on the west bank of Vandoozen creek, for the purpose of carrying on a meeting. Their meeting has been in progress for two weeks. For the benefit of some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that know nothing of the Holiness faith (if there be any), I will giv a short history of their faith, practice, and meeting here. The faction here hav no creed, no churches, no organization. God is their only church. Those desiring to unite with them must profess (be converted), then sanctified. Then they travel on to a state of perfection equal with Christ. They reach a point where they are saved; are sin-proof; are past the point of temptation; sanctified wholly and saved by the blood of the lamb. When one knows he is saved then he belongs to the church of God. As soon as they are saved nearly all of them go to preaching the gospel, both men and women. I hav heard as many as seven of them at one meeting. The greater part of them are an illiterate class. They accept nothing as truth that is not in the Bible's barbarous record, and are avowed enemies to education and scientific principles. I hav heard a great many of them say that they did not want their children to hav any education only just enough to read the Bible. They call themselvs God's saints. Each one givs an exegesis of the Bible of his or her own. They become confused, and wrangle and dispute among themselvs, while preaching. They then pray to God (whose will it is to answer anything they pray for) to make everything right they hav said. They then retire, feeling (each one of them) that they hav expounded the holy scriptures with great force and precision. Uncle believes every word in the Bible, and claims sanctification, but does not think one can get beyond temptation. So one evening after the services at the Tabernacle two of the preachers came home with uncle and me. Uncle disputed the correctness of some of the doctrin they had been preaching regarding temptation. They both undertook to argue him down, but he resorted to the July 5th number of THE TRUTH SEEKER which you sent me, and taking C. B. Reynolds's article on the Lord's prayer in our public schools, completely silenced both of them. Uncle, when he first examined THE TRUTH SEEKERS, said they were snakes—that he would just as leave hav snakes in his house as such papers—and that they were the works of the devil. But he took the devil's argument to down the preachers. The snakes probably do not look quite so venomous as they did at first to him. The Holiness barbarous, heathenish doctrin teaches that people must throw education away; must not recognize science; must discard the affection and love of family for the love of Jesus. Everything that is ennobling; everything that is good and grand, and everything that is to the education and elevation of the people here in this life, must be thrown aside, and people must become fools for Christ's sake. This is the doctrin of the Holiness people. They are not loyal American citizens. All of them that I hav talked with are in favor of God in the Constitution, and one of them said "Bob Ingersoll" ought to hav a rope around his neck, and such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER ought not to be allowed to be printed. Liberals, wake up! Such an element are enemies to science; to education; to liberty, the sweetest boon of all. Just such an element if they should be successful in getting God established in the Constitution, and become a power in our government, would crush out science, education, and liberty, and this country would retrograde and become the home of barbarians. God should be let alone in the clouds, or wherever he is, and kept out of the Constitution, for his name will be poisonous to the page it may occupy. One of the preachers said an incendiary (the devil) burnt his store some years ago, and that it was a good thing it happened—it caused his soul to get saved. Then he gave God the credit for it and beat the devil out of what he deserved. He said, "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord." A lady said her daughter was saved a year ago, but "now she is lost again, and thank God I am going to heaven and she can just go to hell." The girl was present. Oh, how my sympathy ran out for her whose father was dead and whose mother's misguided mind had lost all affection and mother love. Another man in his exhortation thanked God his daughter died about two years ago and went to hell unsaved—"and, thank God, I am going to heaven!" Some of them tell the people if they desire the prayers of God's saints to arise to their feet; then they tell them their prayers cannot save them, they must pray for themselvs. One old sanctimonious-looking gentleman pointed me out the other day and said: "My friend, you are under conviction. Do not you think that now is the time to make a start to get converted, sanctified, and saved? Do not you feel that you are convicted by God's holy word? Are you not bothered in mind?" I said: "No, sir. My mind is at peace, at rest. I am very well satisfied, sir." He wheeled on his heels as quick as a wink and said, "If God cannot convict you I cannot." The same preacher last night was speaking of the sinful world, the whisky hells, the gambling-dens, and other places of vice and sin. He was so clownlike in speech and gestures that some of the boys snickered at him. He said, very sarcastically, "Some of you boys will get something worse than the things I hav spoken of, thank God." He then smiled, as though it would be a beautiful spectacle to see a hell full of burning, roasting souls. If they fail to get followers they seem to be in a bad humor, and they threaten the people with eternal punishment. I appeal to the reasoning powers of every human being in this nation, whose mind is invested with dark superstition and ignorance, to rise above such barbarism and investigate for himself. Persons who believe that God has made his will known to man, and believe every word of the Bible is given of inspiration, and that a loving and all-wise and all-merciful God was really guilty of all the murder and bloodshed the Bible says he is—persons who believe that God caused his only son to be murdered as the only means of saving the lost ones of the world, and believe that God will commit unbelievers who hav honest doubt to an endless punishment—I say such believers, if the laws of our country were such that they could enforce their Bible doctrins, would punish unbelievers here. I would believe in a hell then—the Christians would giv us a hell here on earth. I believe in living in the nineteenth century, not in the time of Moses. I believe in free thought and free speech. I believe in living this life right. I believe in making a heaven here. I believe every preacher and priest in the land could do more good by giving lectures on temperance, morality, science, and education—getting the people interested in and prepared for living a peaceable and good life here. I believe it would do more good than preaching a barbarous history of a barbarous people; a heaven, hell, God, and devil that they know nothing about. The barbarous history of a barbarous people would be all right looked back upon with shame, but when taught as the word of God it brings shame on the one who teaches it. Above all, I believe in a complete separation of church and state, and Universal Mental Liberty.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Only a Boy.

I am only a boy, with a heart light and free;
I am brimming with mischief and frolic and glee;
I dance with delight, and I whistle and sing,
And you think such a boy never cares for a thing.

But boys hav their troubles, though jolly they seem;
Their thoughts can go farther than most people deem.
Their hearts are as open to sorrow as joy,
And each has his feelings, though only a boy.

Now, oft when I've worked hard at piling the wood,
Hav done all my errands, and tried to be good,
I think I might hav a rest or a play;
But how shall I manage? Can anyone say?

If I start for a stroll, it is "Keep off the street!"
If I go to the house, it is "Mercy! what feet!"
If I take a seat, 'tis "Here! giv me that chair!"
If I lounge by a window, 'tis "Don't loiter there!"

If I ask a few questions, 'tis "Don't bother me!"
Or else "Such a torment I never did see!"
I am scolded or cuffed if I make the least noise,
Till I think in this wide world there's no place for boys.

At school they are shocked if I want a good play;
At home or at church I am so in the way;
And it's hard, for I don't see that boys are to blame,
And 'most any boy, too, will say just the same.

Of course a boy can't know as much as a man,
But we try to do right just as hard as we can.
Hav patience, dear people, though oft we annoy,
For the best man on earth once was "Only a Boy."

Corner Gospel.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.

Some people think that it takes a good deal of money to be happy. They think that happiness consists in eating the costliest, wearing the costliest, sleeping in the costliest fashion, and so on. But it does not—no such thing. Some of the most unhappy individuals in this world subsist in luxury, eat, drink, and wear the best. They hav great coffers of wealth at their command, yet are of all men the most miserable. Why so? Because, as a rule, they hav concentrated their wealth upon themselvs. They hav grown in selfishness. They hav overloaded their stomachs in selfishness, covered their bodies in selfishness, stuffed and surfeited so that disease, like a tiger, has sprung upon them, fastened its fangs in their vitals, and is tearing them to pieces. Miserable days and sleepless nights follow them like an avenging nemesis.

Oh, but I want to be rich! you say. No; you don't. You just want to be comfortable, to hav the real wants satisfied, and the artificial ones banished. You know we suffer more because of fancied needs than we ever do from real desires. You require work and enthusiasm to do it. Health, strength, cheerfulness, are three great factors. And the surest way to be happy is to make somebody else happy, not with that definit end of self in view, but simply the wish and the effort to bring happiness into the life of another. Try it. Happiness is in right action, high aims. People forget surroundings with a great purpose in view.

Hugh Miller, you know, was an enthusiastic geologist. See how he describes his abiding-place when pursuing his favorit study early in life: "Do look around," he says in a letter to a friend, "and see the sort of a place in which a man can be happy. The sun is looking in through holes in the roof, speckling the floor with bright patches till it resembles a piece of calico. There are two windows in the apartment, one of them filled up with turf and stones, the other occupied by an old, unglazed frame. The fire is placed against the rough unplastered gable, into which we hav stuck a pin for suspending our pot over it, the smoke finding its way out through the holes of the roof and the window. Our meal-sack hangs by a rope from one of the rafters, at the hight of a man's head from the floor—our only means of preserving it from our thievish co-habitants—the rats. As for our furniture, 'tis altogether admirable. The two large stones are the steadiest seats I ever sat on, though perhaps a little ponderous when we hav occasion to shift them; and the bed is perfectly unique. It is formed of a pair of the minister's harrows, with the spikes turned down, and covered with an old door, and a bunch of straw; and as for culinary utensils, here is a wooden cog and here a pot. We are a little extravagant, to be sure, in our household expenses, for times are somewhat hard; but, meal and salt and every other item included, none of us hav yet exceeded half a crown a week. You may now boast, like a true scholar, who looks only at the past, of Diogenes and his tub, and the comforts of philosophy."

The man was happy, living in this way, because devoted to a great purpose. He ought to hav had different surroundings, but he did not murmur. Absorbed in his work, life was pleasure. If he could be happy with his environment, how much more happy ought you to be with yours, so far more comfortable.

Happiness increases as we lift others out of misery and sorrow. It flows from and follows unselfishness. S. H. W.

By the Forelock.

In listening to the observations of a certain sort, one finds it difficult to class the person making them. Does he indulge in the subtlest sort of humor or is he too liberal-minded to notice the real drift of his remarks?

It was near the end of the winter term, and a teachers' meeting had been called to discuss the timely subject of written examinations.

"I propose having one examination in the forenoon, and one in the afternoon, every day," said the principal.

"That does very well in fair weather," answered one of the teachers, "but on a cloudy day I object to an examination in the afternoon."

"So do I," added another. "The children can't see to write without an effort, and they get tired and nervous."

"Very well, then," said the principal, "in case of a cloudy afternoon, hav that examination the day before!"—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

Sherman, Mich., Aug. 12, 1890.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I hav not seen any letters from this place in the Children's Corner I thought I would write one. My grandpa has taken The Truth Seeker a number of years, and I always read the Children's Corner. I hav both your books, "The Story Hour" and "Apples of Gold." At the last day of the school I go to I spoke the verses entitled, "The Freethinker's Means of Grace." At school I study grammar, writing, history, geography, spelling, and Robinson's arithmetic. I liv in the country, and am eleven years old. My father keeps twenty-two cows, has fifteen calves and four horses. If I see this letter in print I will write again. Anna Southwick.

A PLEASANT LETTER.

Miss S. H. Wixon: Although a stranger to you personally I am not a stranger to your works, having read with considerable interest most, if not all, of your three books, together with your various articles that hav appeared from time to time in the columns of The Truth Seeker, including your visit to Philadelphia and your Sunday out, when Berthia, I think the name was, and yourself spent a portion of the sacred day among the tombstones in the town of Warren. Literary criticism may be confined to philosophy and learning, but the expression of an honest opinion is undoubtedly the birthright of all. Goldsmith says, "Never touch a romance or novel: these paint beauty in colors more charming than nature and describe happiness that man never tastes."

I, however, notwithstanding this admonition, hav read that wonderful book entitled, "All in a Lifetime" with pleasure and, I hope, not without profit.

The book is deeply interesting, inasmuch as it takes the reader through nearly all the different phases of human life, beginning with the Yankee pedler and ending with the miserable death of the deceitful Philip Falsum, showing that the moral law, like the physical, cannot be violated with impunity. I am a nativ of Dumfriesshire, Scotland. My boyhood and in fact some of my manhood days were spent a few miles from the village of Ecclefechan, the birthplace of Thomas Carlyle, and when I read in "All in a Lifetime" the account of the Rev. Mr. Consalem's visit to the house of Mrs. Carden it reminds me very forcibly of my nativ home when the parish minister was visiting members of his congregation. But, unlike Regina Rawley, the Scotch lassies never doubted or disputed any of the doctrins advanced by "his reverence."

There are two chapters in the book that I very much admire. Thev are entitled, "A New Gospel," and "The Voice of One Crying in the Wilderness." In my opinion the contents of those two chapters show great originality of thought, and display, in a remarkable degree, the reasoning powers of a philosophical mind, and although the views which they contain may not yet receive universal acceptance it may be safely asserted that "All in a Lifetime," "Apples of Gold," and "The Story Hour," with its beautiful lessons and sweet, touching poetry, will be read and admired by thousands when this generation has passed away and when our bodies are mingling with the clods of the valley. R. S. C.

[We thank our stranger friend for the above unsolicited commendation of "All In a Lifetime." It is pleasant to know that our work meets with the approbation of scholars and thinkers. An occasional letter like the above givs us inspiration to go on in our chosen field of labor, hoping that the good seed dropped here and there may take root and grow, and, after a while, blossom into full flower and healthy fruitage. Our friend will also please accept our thanks for a thoughtful article on the current methods of thought, and for some very beautiful poetical selections.—Ed. C. C.]

Felix Pyat's name is well known in the roll of French Radicals. The novel presents a vivid panorama of the Paris of the present century. This translation may be counted on as unexceptionable, as coming from the accomplished scholar Benjamin Tucker.

PROTOPLASM AND LIFE. Two Biological Essays. By Charles Cox, M.D. New York: N. D. C. Hodges. Limp cloth, pp 67. Price, 75 cents.

This is a treatment of a subject that is of interest to Freethinkers, the evolution of life. Christians conceive that the production of life from inanimate matter must hav required the offices of a God; Freethinkers are concerned to demonstrate that life could hav arisen by natural processes. This question is here treated with clear reasoning and perspicuous language.

STUDIES IN THEOSOPHY: Historical and Practical. A Manual for the People. By W. J. Colville. Boston, Mass.: Colby & Rich. Cloth, pp. 504. Price, $1.50.

Theosophy is, as most of our readers are aware, a religion or doctrin savoring somewhat of Spiritualism and somewhat of Hindooism, wholly mystical and transcendental, and no doubt rapturous and comforting to those whose reason can be persuaded to giv it admission. Its adherents at least hav the merit, for our purposes, of being available as co-antagonists of Christianity, and we are thus disposed to treat them with considerable of courtesy. This book is a good exposition of the belief.

WHEELBARROW. Articles and Discussions on the Labor Question. Including the controversy with Mr. Lyman J. Gage on the Ethics of the Board of Trade. and the controversy with Mr. Hugh O. Pentecost, and others, on the Single Tax Question. Chicago: Open Court Publishing Co. Cloth, portrait, pp. 388, $1.

This is a well-written book. The adoption by the author of his singular cognomen, "Wheelbarrow," becomes clear after reading the following from the publishers' preface: "The articles of this book were written by a man who worked for years and years, his early childhood not excluded, as an unskilled laborer. With pickax, shovel, and wheelbarrow he helped to lay the first foundations of several railroads in this country. So he knows from experience the sufferings and hardships workingmen hav to endure. His buoyant genius struggled against the odds, the restrictions, the impediments of his position; and by wisely applied exertion he grew in importance as a man, he came to the front as a character who dared to stand up for his ideals of freedom and equal right. Honors were then bestowed upon him: he was elected to represent his fellow-citizens in the legislature of his state, and in the war he rose to the rank of general. He worked no longer with the wheelbarrow, but with his brains; he was powerful as an orator, and wielded his pen with ability and vigor. But greater than his genius is the honesty of his aspirations, the nobility of his ideals, the broadness of his views. While aspiring to more intellectual and higher work, his sympathies with the laboring classes never waned."

A THOUGHTLESS YES. By H. H. Gardener. Price, 50 cents.

This handsome little volume, bound in heavy, plate paper, and sold at fifty cents, should be read by all our subscribers. It consists of nine short stories which are pronounced protests against many of the fashionable vices and hoary evils of the hour. There is always a strong moral purpose behind everything Miss Gardener writes. She is not one of that vast constituency who are guilty of giving a thoughtless yes to wrongs because they hav the stamp of age, or the approval of Mrs. Grundy. It would be difficult to say which of the admirable stories in this volume are most to be commended. "A Splendid Judge of a Woman," "The Boler House Mystery," "The Lady of the Club," and "For the Prosecution," are exceptionally excellent. It must appear remarkable to those accustomed to look on the church as the conservator of moral strength and impulse that to-day so many of the most earnest, able, and effectiv reformers are found in the ranks of Liberalism. There is Miss Gardener doing such splendid work in the way of making men think, while she unmasks the great wrongs of the hour. There is Colonel Ingersoll who has recently given us the noblest plea for justice and humanity in the treatment of criminals which has been made in modern times. Edgar Fawcett's "The Evil that Men Do," though denounced by those who do not like their infamy unmasked, and those who believe that the ostrich is the wisest of creatures as evinced by its burying its head in the sand when danger approaches, is nevertheless a work which is bound to do incalculable good in awakening public sentiment, and as a warning to girls who know not the frightful temptations that will beset them in our great cities. Prof. Jos. Rodes Buchanan's brilliant plea for moral, industrial, and physical culture in his "New Education," and his recent able paper on woman, published in the Arena, are a few illustrations among many that could be cited, in which we find the standards of a higher civilization being carried by Liberal thinkers. All of which should teach the church that earnest thinkers cannot wait her slow movement, when the miseries of society call loudly for immediate reform. Every story found in the pages of "A Thoughtless Yes," conveys a great moral lesson in a manner always vivid, invariably forcible, sometimes startling, yet nowhere does the strength of the narrativ display weakness owing to the author's moralizing.—Arena.

"External Nature" is a paper-covered book of 70 pages, in which M. S. Hall, of Omaha, Neb., expresses in prose and verse some Antichristian ideas.

"Practical Sanitary and Economic Cooking, adapted to Persons of Moderate and Small Means," is the essay, by Mrs. Mary Hinman Abel, that took a prize from the American Public Health Association. It is now published in a cloth-bound volume of 190 pages. Price, 50 cents.

A neat cloth-bound volume of 74 pages embodies a mystical rhapsody in verse entitled, "The Finding of the Gnosis—An Interior-life Drama wherein is brought to Light the Inmost Secret of all Veritable Religion, the Mystery of Divine Self." The Occult Publishing Co., of Boston, publish it at 50 cents.

"A Refutation of the Single Tax and Pungent Criticism of 'Progress and Poverty.'" This pamphlet of 32 pages, whose nature is sufficiently expressed by its title, is written by Alfred G. Yewen and published by the International Publishing Company, Sydney, Aus. Price, 20 cents.

The publishers of the Theosophist, Madras, India, also issue works on "Theosophy, religion, magic, sorcery, phantoms, Spiritualism, thought-reading, psychometry, astrology, palmistry, hygiene, etc." Two tracts on matters of the forementioned remarkable nature hav been forwarded us. Their titles are "Kosmic Mind" and "Sorcery in Science."

"Sanitary Entombment, the Ideal Disposition of the Dead," is a pamphlet by Rev. Charles R. Treat, rector of the Church of the Archangel, New York. He advocates the erection of a vast edifice in which the bodies of the dead shall be interred under the action of a process of aeration that obviates the objectionable consequences of present methods of burial.

Axel Lundberg, the Swedish Freethought lecturer of the West, sends us a lecture, "Om Djefvulen, Helvetet, den Eviga Fördömmelse Yttersta Domen," in which he in vigorous language lets the Christian into the origin of the devil, eternal punishment, and doomsday, and uses the occasion to point out the inhuman and cruel character of these conceptions. The pages are 32; the price is 10 cents.

Any of our readers who are interested in the question whether the conception of Christ's character and the materials of Christianity were derived from the character of the Indian Christna and the religion of Christnaism, are recommended to a work by John M. Robertson as an excellent one on the subject. The title is "Christ and Crishna," and it is issued by the Freethought Publishing Co., of London, Eng., at $1.

"Catechism on the Science of a Universal Religion; or, What We Can and Must Do, in Coöperation, to Secure a True Religion and Universal Happiness." Such is the title of a book of 118 pages by Gabriel Z. Wacht, San Francisco, Cal. The doctrins of the first part of the work are in regard to such deep matters as the creation of the world, eternity, matter and spirit, etc. The propositions next broached are that men should unite in societies coöperativ first in interchange of knowledge and apprisal of wants, and second in industry.

It will interest any of our readers who travel and collect books containing information about foreign countries, to learn that the Association of Commerce and Industry has published a profusely illustrated guide of Geneva, Switzerland, which contains a map of that city and a large amount of information relativ to the same, and the Swiss industries and educational institutions, historical notes, etc. The book will be sent free of charge upon application to the New World Travel Company, tourist and excursion agents, 321 Broadway, New York.

"Live Questions" is a sensible book written by John P. Altgeld, and published by Donohue & Henneberry, Chicago. The "live questions" treated are "Protection of non-combatants, or compulsory arbitration of strikes.—Pensions for soldiers.—The administration of justice in Chicago; unanimous juries.—The abolition of constables.—Justices and their fee systems.—Protecting the ballot-box; Australian plan.—Is the world worse?—Divorces.—Moral training.—The rich man's bread and the poor; Cardinal Manning.—Slave girls of Chicago, legislation for.—Anonymous journalism and its effects.—The immigrant's answer.—The eight-hour movement.—Our penal machinery and its victims."

"Er Biblen Guds Ord?" In this book of 130 pages the author, N. S. Johnson, subjects the Bible to a critical examination. He points out its immoralities, absurdities, and self-contradictions; givs his readers a sketch of the lives of other saviors, and concludes by giving copious citations from pagan philosophers, thus showing that a high status of morality can easily be conceived and practiced even if one does not know the Bible. The book we recommend as a good Freethought ABC to hand to new Danish arrivals who yet hav found no answer to the author's question, "Is the Bible the Word of God?" The price, we suppose, is 75 cents. Published by the author at Sioux Falls, Dak.

The August number of the Arena exhibits the characteristic boldness and fearlessness that has made the review so popular in the short space of nine months. Absolute freedom in the discussion of all great problems is novel in magazine literature, yet this has been a characteristic of the Arena. The present issue contains an interesting paper from Prof. N. S. Shaler, of Harvard University, on "The Economic Future of the New South," in which the scientist notices at length the wonderful resources of the South, her natural advantages in soil, climate, and great mineral resources. "Our Foreign Immigration; its Social Aspects," is the subject of an essay by a thinker who chooses to veil his identity under a nom de plume. In this paper are found some startling facts which appeal to all thinking men and women. "Hypnotism and its Relation to Jurisprudence," by Emily Kempin, LL.D., is worthy the attention of all readers who are interested in this marvelous psychological problem, which is now engrossing the attention of leading scientists on both sides of the Atlantic. This paper treats of the strange power; how people are hypnotized; the value of this agent in medical and surgical practice; the significance of the discovery from a judicial point of view. Marion Harland treats of the "Domestic Infelicity of Literary Women." The "No-Name" paper this month is bright. It is one of the peculiar methods of the Arena that it shows up the evils of the hour in a telling manner. "The Coming Cataclysm of America and Europe," by Prof. J. Rodes Buchanan, is a startling article.

"The Bible and Evolution," by our old contributor, Arthur B. Moss, is thus characterized:

The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone says: "I thank you for your courtesy, and you may rely upon me to carefully examin the work you hav been good enough to send."

Charles Bradlaugh, M.P., says: "The author has long won his spurs as a Freethought lecturer. One of his best-sustained literary efforts."

The Freethinker says: "We heartily recommend it as an excellent text-book of the subject. The reader is carried along on an easy-flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common sense."

Watts's Literary Guide says: "In a shrewd, practical, common-sense way, Mr. Moss exposes the weakness of biblical science and morality."

Charles Watts says: "It bears marks of deep thought and extensiv research, and is written in a popular and dignified style."

Agnosco, in Secular Thought, says: "Mr. Arthur B. Moss is well known to be one of the leading men in the English Freethought party. Whatever he writes is well worth careful perusal. His latest production is no exception to the rule, for it deals with its subject in a masterly and fair-minded way."

The Agnostic Journal says: "Mr. Moss has produced if not a brilliant or epoch-making work, at least a plain, solid, sensible effort for the enlightenment and instruction of those yet lingering in the shadows of the temples destitute of all sacredness, and from which the light of inspiration has faded."

The price of the volume is $1.

"Appel aux Libres-Penseurs pour la foundation d'un comité d'Etudes Morales," by Jean-Paul Cée. This pamphlet, which numbers 35 pages, contains, as the title indicates, an appeal to the Freethought societies of the civilized world, each to appoint a committee for the purpose of forming a system of ethics which can be easily understood by young as well as old. The proposal contained in this pamphlet was laid before the late Universal Freethought Congress, and received with unanimous favor. To the pamphlet, which contains the opinions of eminent Freethinkers, French as well as foreign, the president of the French Freethought Federation, J. B. Schacre, has furnished an excellent introduction.

By the same author there has been published "Avant-project d'un Code des Lois Morales," a work of 185 pages. In this larger work, "Advance-Project of a Code of Moral Laws," Mr. Jean Paul Cée givs a sketch of his system. He tells us first what man is and what the destiny of humanity. After thus forming his basis he proceeds in a very attractiv and sensible way to tell what in his opinion should be taught the child, the youth, and the person of mature years. He tells us what is the dutv and domain of woman in the human family. For the ideas pervading his plan we direct our readers' attention to the translated preface by Mr. Schacre, and it is our intention in a separate article, which will appear later, to examin the subject somewhat ourselvs. The simultaneous proposals and attempts by Liberals in different countries to formulate a system of morals for practical teaching indicate the deeply felt need. Hence every proposal ought carefully to be examined, that we may elicit the truly best one, and thus not alone hav an answer to the Christian query, "What do you Infidels giv us in place of the moral teachings contained in the Bible?" but, what is far more important, hav a competent moral guide for the converted as well as for our children.

"Die Darwin'she Theorie von der Entstehung und Umwandlung der Lebewelt," by Prof. D. Ludwig Büchner. In this book Professer Büchner applies the theory of Darwin to man, and views it in regard to progress, and in regard to its relationship to Materialistic philosophy. This work, which must be classed with the same author's "Man and his Place in Nature," appears in the form of six popular lectures. The latest results of scientific research are brought to bear upon the subject under discussion. We direct our readers' attention to the fourth lecture especially, in which the professor views the theory of Darwin in its relation to Materialistic philosophy, and givs a short history of the latter. Materialism is generally confounded with sensualism, with "Enjoy thyself, perchance to-morrow you may be dead," and yet no greater mistake could be made; for the future greatness of mankind is to be brought about through the application of the principles of Materialistic science to the realization of the dreams of idealism. The price of the book, the fifth edition of which we hav here noticed, is $2.50.

By the same author there has been written a short pamphlet, "Zwei Gehrönte Freidenker." These two crowned Freethinkers are Frederick the Great (1740–1786) and the Indian emperor Akbar (1556–1605). The author views his two heroes in their capacities as regents, generals, and philosophers, paying particular attention to the latter. It cannot be said that the work contains anything new to the historical student, yet we cannot consider the professor's work to hav been entirely in vain, for from a perusal of this pamphlet the reader will not alone receive a good idea of these two great men, but likewise accumulate a store of facts which might be used with profit when a Christian brags of eminent men said to hav belonged to the church; for a greater ruler and a better man than the pagan Akbar we shall not easily find—the only one we know of is the pagan Marcus Aurelius. The book, which contains several passages from the writings and letters of Frederick II., numbers 110 pages, and can be had for 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

A STRIKE on the New York Central railroad is vexing passengers and delaying freight.

IN Algeria two thousand French soldiers aided by twelve thousand nativs are combating a grasshopper plague.

AT the Tenth International Medical Congress opened at Berlin on the 4th there were 5,000 physicians, of whom 500 were from America.

On the night of the 9th a meeting of the Young People's Literary Society of the Grand avenue Methodist church, Kansas City, broke up in a free fight.

REV. W. H. BOONE, a colored preacher of Gordon county, Ga., put rat poison in the food of a family of ten, to get possession of their crops. Three are dead.

ON the 3d a storm dilapidated Sioux Falls, S. D. The cathedral just built by Mrs. John Jacob Astor, of New York, presented a sorry spectacle when the lightning had finished with it.

A WESTERN G. A. R. encampment has reached the extreme of pension demanding by this request: "We now demand a per diem service pension for every man in the service pure and simple."

AT the International Peace Congress there was submitted this statement of how each pound of England's public expenditure during the century has been applied: On war and preparation for war, 16s. 3½d.; on all expenses of civil government, 3s. 8½d.

THE official rough count shows the population of Chicago to be 1,098,576 This is an increase during the decade of 595,398, or 118 32 per cent. Chicago has a population of about 53,682 in excess of Philadelphia, and is, therefore, the second city in population in the United States.

AT Pittston, Pa., Father Warnigaris, who suffered removal from St. Mary's church in the late quarrels, is suing for recompense for robbery of wine, clothes, and cash which he alleges were stolen when the St. Joseph Society forcibly took possession of the parsonage and held it against all comers.

THERE is a strike in Wales of 170,000 railroad men and miners. The mails are being dispatched along the high roads in carts, which go under the protection of a special and strong guard. The railway lines are dotted all along with groups of men who are determined to resist and put a stop to all traffic should any be attempted.

SAN SALVADOR has beat Guatemala in six engagements. The latter, it is said, provoked the war with the design to take possession of Salvador, and then extend her despotic sway over Central America. Nicaraugua, Costa Rica, and Salvador were aiming to model their republics after the United States, and dislike Guatemalan despotism.

Two judges hav taken up their stand in Perry county, Ky., under the protection of troops, and opened court to administer justice. The neighborhood has had countless murders in the last few years, and been convulsed by feuds. No court has been held for two years, the last judge being shot and driven away. One of the present judges was shot at on the 9th.

Two colored churches in Toronto, Can., the African Episcopal Methodist church of the United States and the British Methodist Episcopal church of Canada, are struggling over the possession of a church building. One party arrives early and bars and bolts the doors and windows, when the other party arrives and, smashing them in, enters and joins in the services.

JUDGE ELLIOTT of the Indiana supreme court, an eminent Republican, at a late Bar Association meeting said that the United States Supreme Court "has carried the doctrin of central power to the utmost verge of safety. The decision of the Court in the original package case," he said, "is a strong, and with profound deference I suggest, a dangerous assertion of central power."

THE society and the members of the congregation of the Italian church of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel, Williamsburgh, N. Y., celebrated the feast of Our Lady of Snow on the 5th with a parade in the afternoon and a display of fireworks in the evening. As the processionists were passing along North Sixth street they set upon a number of truckmen who interrupted the procession by driving through Havemeyer street. The police interfered to stop the fight, and were themselvs assaulted. Policeman John Cronin was struck down with a cobblestone and Policeman McConegby was struck on the head. When the reserve of police arrived they fell upon the fighters, and after a short struggle arrested the ringleaders. In the evening, Police Captain Short and a platoon of men attended the display of fireworks. It passed off quietly. The feast celebrated is in commemoration of the Virgin, who, it is said, appeared as a figure of snow in a province near Naples to confound those who were preaching against her and the savior.

Gems of Thought.

TWENTY doctors expound one text twenty ways, as children make descant upon plain song.—Tyndale.

ONE has said and insisted that such a passage meant such a thing; another that it meant directly the contrary; and a third, that it means neither one nor the other, but something different from both; and this they call understanding the Bible.—Paine.

HERE is an incomprehensible question which, for more than sixteen hundred years, has furnished exercise for curiosity, for sophistic subtlety, for animosity, for the spirit of cabal, for the fury of dominion, for the rage of persecution, for blind and sanguinary fanaticism, for barbarous credulity, and which has produced more horrors than the ambition of princes, which ambition has occasioned not a few. Is Jesus the Word? If he be the Word, did he emanate from God in time or before time? If he emanated from God is he co-eternal and con-substantial with him, or is he of a similar substance? Is he distinct from him or is he not? Is he made or begotten? Can he beget in his turn? Has he paternity, or productiv virtue without paternity? Is the Holy Ghost made? or begotten? or produced? or proceeding from the father? or proceeding from the son? or proceeding from both? Can he beget? can he produce? is his hypostasis con-substantial with the hypostasis of the father and the son? and how is it that, having the same nature—the same essence as the father and the son, he cannot do the same things done by these persons who are himself?—Voltaire.

To show you what great subjects occupied the attention of Calvin, it is only necessary to state that he furiously discussed the question as to whether the sacramental bread should be leavened or unleavened.—Ingersoll.

FORTITUDE is the guard and supporter of the other virtues.—Locke.

ONLY a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never givs.
—Herbert.

SLEEP even should be taken in obedience to our will. He who allows himself to go to sleep when he does not want to, has not adequate control of himself; and if he were a sentinel he would be shot for unfaithfulness. There should be no accidental rest any more than accidental labor. We ought not to quit work without our own permission, but learn to get our consent to all time given to idleness, as well as to labor. . . . We should learn, when we know what we want to do, to will to do it. Volition should be trained to follow quick on judgment. To see our duty should be to do it.—Bierbower.

'TIS in ourselvs that we are thus, or thus. Our bodies are our gardens; to the which, our wills are gardeners; so that if we will plant nettles, or sow lettuce; set hyssop, and weed up thyme; supply it with one gender of herbs, or distract it with many; either to hav it steril with idleness, or manured with industry; why, the power and corrigible authority of this lies in our wills. If the balance of our lives had not one scale of reason to poise another of sensuality, the blood and baseness of our natures would conduct us to most preposterous conclusions: But we hav reason to cool our raging motions, our carnal stings, our unbitted lusts.—Shakspere.

THE heart has its reasons, of which judgment so-called knows nothing.—Pascal.

AT need the heart takes the place of the brain. The inspired, impassioned man penetrates into things; perceives the cause by the shock which he feels from it; he embraces aggregates by the lucidity and velocity of his creativ imagination; he discovers the unity of a group by the unity of the emotion which he receives from it.—Taine.

VOLTAIRE had used the modern discoveries in physics as one of the numerous weapons of attack and ridicule directed by him against the scriptures. He found that the most popular systems of geology were accommodated to the sacred writings, and that much ingenuity had been employed to make every fact coincide exactly with the Mosaic account of the creation and deluge. It was, therefore, with no friendly feelings that he contemplated the cultivators of geology in general, regarding the science as one which had been successfully enlisted by theologians as an ally in their cause.—Lyell's Geology.

TOWARD the close of the last century, in England, the opponents of geology on biblical grounds seemed likely to sweep all before them. Cramping our sacred volume within the rules of an historical compend, they showed the terrible dangers arising from the revelations of geology, which make the earth older than the six thousand years required by Archbishop Usher's interpretation of the Old Testament.—Prof. A. D. White.

FROM the day when the doctrin of Antinaturalism succeeded in superseding the lingering influence of pagan philosophy progressiv industry waned.—Oswald.

IMMEDIATELY after the epocha of time, ascribed to the dawning of divine light, the human mind seems generally to hav suffered an eclipse. The arts and sciences, intelligence and virtue, were smitten with an unaccountable palsy.—Taylor.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 17. No. 34. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, August 23, 1890 {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

When the Americans residing in St. Petersburg asked permission to celebrate the Fourth of July the authorities peremptorily refused them the privilege. But the Frenchmen of that city and Moscow were allowed to celebrate the establishment of the first republic of France on July 14th with great pomp and public demonstrations.

The Loyal American of Chicago givs a list of teachers in all the public schools of that city and the suburbs. In thirty-four schools of Chicago there are five hundred and eighty-eight teachers, three hundred and sixty-five of whom, or sixty-three per cent, are Roman Catholics. It has been repeatedly stated that the large majority of all the teachers in the public schools in all the large cities are Romanists.

In the government of Podol the peasants hav no scruples about selling their children. Instances of a very revolting nature are reported in a Moscow daily. One peasant sold his daughter, a girl of eight years, to traveling mendicants for the sum of six rubles; another one brought two girls to the town of Granova, where he sold the elder, a child of seven years, for five rubles, and the younger, three years old, for three rubles. Such instances hav occurred in many other towns of Christian Russia.

The Patterson, N. J., Press has written to the authorities of one hundred and three of the principal cities of the United States for information as to the regulations governing the use of their public parks on Sunday. Replies were received from eighty-nine, and of these, New Orleans is the only city which makes no distinction between Sunday and other days of the week. Washington, D. C., and Richmond, Va., furnish no means of recreation and permit no amusements whatever in their parks on Sunday.

"The National League for the Protection of American Institutions" givs the following as the government appropriations to Indian schools: 1886—$228,259, of which Roman Catholics received $118,343, or 52 per cent. 1887—$363,214, of which Roman Catholics received $194,636, or 62 per cent. 1888—$376,264, of which Roman Catholics received $221,169, or 68 per cent. 1889—$539,905, of which the Roman Catholics received $347,672, or 70 per cent. 1890—561,950, of which the Roman Catholics received $356,957, or 70 per cent.

A curious and interesting feature of the Metropolitan Museum of Art on free days, says the Sun, is the presence at noon of workmen in overalls, and bearing all the marks of recent toil. They evidently come from the scene of building operations hard by, and their presence shows how eagerly workingmen would welcome the opening of the museums on Sundays. The Sunday closing, by the way, is more and more a farce, for there is a constant increase in the number of Sunday passes issued to artists and their friends.

It must ever be remembered that the right to the mails is an essential factor in our freedom. If we hastily concede to the department the power of censorship over one kind of publication why not over another? There was once a postmaster-general, we believe, who refused to transmit abolition newspapers and documents. If we remember aright, he was sustained in this by the great authority of Jackson. How monstrous the suggestion appears now! And yet the abolition newspaper was more pernicious in the honest eyes of Amos Kendall than the writings of Count Tolstoi to the pure mind of Mr. Tyner.—Herald.

It has been estimated by an employee of the United States bureau of labor, that there are twenty-seven thousand married men in the city of New York who are supported by their wives, less than seven thousand of whom are in menial service. The modistes are in the majority. This includes dressmakers and milliners, many of whom own property, some being very wealthy and all well-to-do. The boarding-house-keepers rank next in number; the professional women—who embrace doctors, lawyers, dentists, aurists, writers, teachers, musicians, lecturers, designers, painters, and embroiderers—come third. Then there are the shopkeepers, who, it is said, make the best providers.

If anyone doubts that Canada is a day or two behind the age let him read this dispatch from Ottawa: "For two long years residents in the vicinity of 40 Prince street, Toronto, hav patiently stood scoldings and abuse from Mrs. Annie Pope, but patience has ceased to be a virtue, and she has been tried by the police magistrate and committed for trial at the assize court for being a common scold. The charge is laid against her under a very antiquated statute, which reads as follows: 'For being a common and turbulent brawler and sower of discord among her quiet and honest neighbors, so that she has become a public nuisance to her neighborhood by her scolding, quarreling, inciting strifes, controversies, quarrels, and disputes among her majesty's liege people, against the peace of our lady the queen, her crown, and dignity, the common nuisance of divers of her majesty's liege subjects.' Mrs. Pope was committed for trial and her husband went bail. The punishment for the offense is the treatment of the ducking-stool."

Last spring, Senator Vance introduced in the Senate "a bill to release certain church property in the District of Columbia from taxation," which enacts, "That all taxes and special assessments which may hav been heretofore charged against any church property in the District of Columbia, but remained unpaid, be canceled and released; provided, that at the time such tax or special assessment was levied, the property in question was used exclusivly for church purposes." Thus, unquestioned, comments the American Sentinel, would the United States government recognize the demand of the church for this modicum of indirect support from the state. As church property is untaxed, so all other property must submit to a heavier taxation in proportion, and therefore the taxes, which the church property would otherwise pay, are divided pro rata among all taxpayers, and consequently the entire taxable property is assessed with the church taxes. By this indirection the churchman obtains from the non-churchgoer just so much toward the aggrandizement of his church, and the more worldly, wealthy, covetous, and miserly the church organization is, just so much more involuntary support and aid it draws from those who are not in sympathy with its hoarding methods.

The sultan of Zanzibar has decreed that there shall be no more slavery throughout his dominions. The decree, which has been placarded under the sultan's seal in Arabic and English, provides in detail that the exchange, sale, or purchase of slaves, domestic or otherwise, is absolutely prohibited. Houses hitherto kept for this purpose are forever closed. All slave-brokers exercising their occupation are liable to severe punishment and deportation. Any Arab found trafficking in slaves will be liable to similar punishment. Any houses used in the future for such traffic will be forfeited. On the death of their present owners slaves shall, ipso facto, be free, unless the deceased leave lawful children, who may inherit them. Slaves cannot be willed away or sold after the death of their owner. Any Zanzibar subject marrying or married to a person under British jurisdiction is henceforth disabled from holding slaves. All slaves of such persons are now declared free. No freed slaves are in any circumstances to possess a slave. Every slave is to hav the absolute right henceforth to purchase his freedom at a reasonable price. The sultan binds himself to accord special protection to such slaves and to all slaves freed under the decree or otherwise. Every slave is to hav the same rights as the Arabs to prosecute complaints and claims in courts of justice.

M. M. Trumbull, "Wheelbarrow" of the Open Court, exclaims: "How much the school of divinity in which a man has been educated controls his estimate of character! 'He was one of God's own people,' said a citizen of Chicago, in grateful tribute to the memory of Mr. Pat Sharkey, of New York, recently deceased. 'He was one of God's own people,' he remarked, with plaintiv sorrow: 'His place was a great resort for sporting men of all kinds. Sharkey backed all the rowing men, fighters, and athletes. He lost $2,700 on Kilrain in the Sullivan-Kilrain fight. Pat kept a saloon at the corner of Thirteenth street, and was one of the prominent men of Tammany.' In addition to these merits it appears that Pat "maintained two households,' presided over by different women, each of whom now claims to be his widow. It is rather perplexing that although Pat was 'one of God's own people,' his body was denied burial in consecrated ground by the clergy of the church to which he belonged; and the reason for this is more perplexing still. Pat was not refused burial in a consecrated ground because he kept a resort for sporting men of all kinds, nor because he backed all the fighters, nor because he was a member of Tammany, which in the opinion of some people ought to exclude a man from consecrated ground; nor because of his Mormon practices, but because he had belonged to the several orders known as Freemasons, Knights of Pythias, and Elks. Although there may be some harmless nonsense in their ceremonials, these orders are provident and benevolent societies, to which any man may innocently belong. The theology of it all is wonderful."

Tolstoi, says the Sun, is too much in earnest to degrade his purpose by uncleanly suggestions. He is coarse and brutal, but never obscene; for he believes that he holds some sort of a spiritual commission to reform the world by reducing it to barbarism and taking away the beauty and joy of existence. Such asceticism, however expressed, does not hav a dangerous fascination for men, as everybody knows. Their temptations do not lie in that direction, as its teaching is contrary to nature, and a strong revolt against it is natural. Love will continue to be the motiv for marriage, as it has been from the beginning, and marriage will remain honorable in the eyes of all men, whatever the morbid Russian pessimist may say after years hav quenched the fires of his heart. Yet, as Principal Donaldson showed some time since, the views of Tolstoi are very similar to those which were expounded by early Christian ascetics. The opposition to marriage was strong in the second and third centuries of the Christian era, and the invectivs against whatever tended to make the beauty of women more alluring were many and bitter. Virginity was exalted as the high and holy state, Tertullian teaching that wives were women of the second degree of modesty. "Natural grace," he says elsewhere, in speaking of women, "must be obliterated by concealment and negligence, as being dangerous to the glances of the beholder's eyes." Clement of Alexandria declares that to a woman "it brings shame to reflect of what nature she is." As a result of such teachings, and so far as they were followed, domestic affection passed away, and to them Principal Donaldson attributes "the prevalent hardness of heart" of the succeeding century. But human nature rebelled, as now it revolts against the assaults of Tolstoi's morbid mind and diseased imagination. You might as well tell men to put out their eyes because to see the beauty of nature is a sin.

An urgent call for more missionaries comes to the Independent from mission stations of the American board in every part of heathendom. The universal appeal is for more men and more money. The same cry is sent forth by the missionaries of every Protestant denomination, and it is heard as often in England as in our own country. The late missionary conference at Shanghai formally called upon the Protestant world to send one thousand recruits to China during the next five years. The Independent exhorts the Congregationalists to double their contributions for missionary purposes, declaring that "the master's business requires haste." The Rev. Mr. Farnsworth, writing from a mission in western Turkey, reports that souls are "perishing for lack of a little of the Lord's money." The Churchman is trying to raise $1,000,000 for the Episcopal missions, home and foreign, and the Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians are appealing with unwonted energy for more money for heathen evangelization. It is evident, says the Sun, that the purpose of this general movement is to rekindle the missionary enthusiasm, which the religious discussion of the period has undoubtedly had a tendency to cool. In the first place, Canon Taylor, of the Church of England, has shown that the heathen and Mohammedans of Asia and Africa are increasing at the annual rate of more than eleven million, while the number of nativ converts made by Protestant missionaries, at an expense in money of $10,000,000, is not more than sixty thousand a year. The present missionary methods seem to him a great practical failure, and he likens the situation to "the tortoise racing with a railway train; the longer the race continues the further the tortoise is left behind." But the drift of theological opinion during the recent years has exercised a more potent influence than these hard and cold statistics. Formerly the conviction was universal among orthodox believers that the heathen would be doomed to hell and everlasting torment if they were not converted to Christianity, and from the first that has been the great inspiring force in missionary enterprise. Now the sentiment is growing more and more prevalent that justice requires that the heathen should hav a chance for salvation by means of a second probation in the world to come. One of the prime objects of the movement for the revision of the Westminster Confession is to get rid of the doctrin of heathen damnation. The Andover school of Congregationalists also stand out against a decree so terrible. Professor Briggs of the Union Theological Seminary thinks that the theory of a second probation has not received sufficient consideration. Young men offering themselvs as candidates for missionary appointments are horrified at the teaching that heathen are passing into the torments of hell at the rate of many millions annually. A tendency toward Universalism appears throughout the Christian world. The love of God is the favorit theme, not the terrors of his justice. Modern sentiment, so tender and so sympathetic, recoils from the thought of everlasting suffering for anybody. Hence the main motiv for heathen evangelization is passing away. If the heathen are not to be damned because they are heathen, but are to be saved by angelic instruction in the life to come, pious people hav no longer the reason to sacrifice themselvs on their behalf which they had when they believed that the fires of hell were burning for the whole heathen world. Artificial methods to rekindle the missionary enthusiasm of the past may produce some temporary effect, but if the present drift toward second probation and Universalism continues, they will hav no lasting power. How different was the case when these words of the Westminster Confession expressed the common orthodox belief: "Much less can man, not professing the Christian religion, be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, and the law of that religion they do profess, and to assert and maintain that they may is very pernicious and to be detested."

Talmage Appealed to the Wrong Man.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., Dear Sir: Your kind letter is received, and carefully read and considered. You request me to procure four new subscribers for the Christian Herald, and with them, attend the dedication of your Tabernacle in September. You will regret to learn that my views and convictions on theological and religious questions are so radically opposed to yours, that I cannot, in the present state of my development, consistently comply. I am pleased to think, however, that perhaps this is my golden opportunity to get light; that your superior intellectual ability, vastly greater opportunities, and more extensiv reading will enable you to clear up all the doubts and difficulties which separate me from your position and bring me back to the faith of my fathers. If you do so, I promis you twice four subscribers, and if your "Christian Scientists" will cure me of my lameness, and enable me to walk, I will attend your "Dedication," and declare to the assembled multitude your wonderful achievements.

In western Pennsylvania, where I was born, and spent nearly all my life, Scotch-Irish Calvinistic Presbyterianism was the prevailing religion. Unfortunately, I was, in very early life, so educated and drilled in the creed of that religion, that I embraced it with all its horrible doctrins. Before reaching manhood, I had read the Bible carefully many times through, and memorized much of it, and nearly all the catechism. The most honored books in my father's library were, first about a dozen Bibles and hymn-books, Scott's Commentary, and then such works as those of Edwards, Doddridge, Baxter, etc. In my youth I had read all the standard replies to Paine—Leslie's "Easy Method with the Deist," etc., but no Infidel works, as they were not allowed in my father's library. In 1829, a "Temperance Society" was organized at New Bedford, on the total abstinence principle. Its pledge I signed, and hav sacredly kept, so that I never drank a glass of any kind of intoxicating liquor in my life. This organization was bitterly opposed and denounced by a large per centage of the Christian community as an unchristian, Infidel movement. They quoted the scriptures freely against it, showing that they sanctioned the use of intoxicants as a beverage—taught us to consider wine as one of God's great blessings, and their deprivation as one of his special curses. They showed that Christ made wine, (and a good article at that), to be used by persons who had already "well drunk," and that he drank it himself whenever the occasion offered, until people took notice of it, and called him a "winebibber."

Next, we organized an antislavery society. This was denounced even more generally and more bitterly by the Christian brethren than the former had been, our Presbyterian minister leading off, and defending slavery from the Bible. In 1794 the Presbyterian church had verbally testified very strongly against slavery, declaring slaveholders to be "man-stealers," "sinners of the first rank," "the highest kind of thieves," and in 1818 she renewed her testimony in language almost as strong. Yet, strange to say, notwithstanding these just and terrible denunciations of slavery and slaveholders, these "man-stealers" were the leaders and most honored members and ministers of the church. The direct road to honor and preferment in that church was to defend slavery from the Bible. Its general assembly resolved that neither Christ nor his apostles had condemned slavery and they would not. The Methodist Episcopal church made a similar record. Though its founder, John Wesley, had declared slavery to be the "execrable sum of all villainies," the general conference, in which were many slaveholders, in 1836, resolved that they had no "right, wish, or intention" to interfere in behalf of the slave. And all the large churches pursued a similar course, and boldly justified their pro-slavery action from the Bible. After much thought I came deliberately to the conclusion that a religious organization that boastingly fellowshipped "man-stealers," and justified their infamous deeds, was not a church of Christ, but rather, what William Lloyd Garrison said it was, "a synagog of Satan" and a "brotherhood of thieves," and no fit association for a decent, honest man, so I left it. This conduct of the churches led me to a careful investigation of the question: What has been the influence of the Bible and Christianity upon the world? According to Hallam and other reliable historians their influence, as exemplified in both the Greek and Latin churches, has been most disastrous. We hav a modified example of the former in Russia today and a much improved specimen of the latter in Spain. Under their influence, moral and intellectual darkness that might be felt settled down upon the Christian nations. Intelligence and virtue disappeared; ignorance, cruelty, lust, and treachery with unbridled sway ruled Christendom. Science, which is ascertained, classified facts or truths, was utterly ignored, and its advocates persecuted, imprisoned, tortured, and murdered. The geocentric theory, including a flat earth, and other similar absurd Christian nonsense, was authoritativly established. The Christian authorities, with the Bible in one hand and the fagot in the other, dared any man to speak in opposition to the established theory, on pain of torture, death, and damnation. For bravely uttering thoughts they could not but think, Vanini's tongue was torn out, and he and Bruno burnt at the stake, and thousands of other good, truth-loving men and women were cruelly outraged for the same offense. Kings, nobles, and church dignitaries rioted in wealth, luxury, and debauchery, while the masses toiled in ignorance, filth, penury, and rags. These facts suggested the question, Does a belief in the inspiration of the Bible tend to produce these unhappy results? There are many passages in the Bible, as there are in the sacred books of the eastern nations generally, that denounce oppression, falsehood, lust, etc. So that those who wish to defend a pure and upright life from scripture texts can do so, but for them it is not necessary; they would do right if there were no such texts. But unfortunately there is a much larger class who, like the slaveholders and Mormons, seek for texts of an opposit character, by which to defend their evil doings, and the great misfortune is that they can find them in abundance.

Fifty years ago it was common to hear ministers of the gospel read from Leviticus xxv what they called their divine commission—to buy, sell, and hold slaves, and transmit them to their children as a "possession" and "inheritance for ever." And I hav heard them read also from Exodus xxi to prove that the slaveholder had a divine right to whip his slave to death without punishment, provided he did not keep on beating until he died "under his hand," but left off while he had sufficient vitality left to liv twenty-four hours, and the reason given was, "because he is his money," and believing in the inspiration of the scriptures the nine-tenths of the pro-slavery community were satisfied that slavery, with all its essential abominations, was a divine institution.

I hav heard orthodox ministers defend in the pulpit, from the Bible, aggressiv war, with all its necessary cruelties. They referred to Joshua's wholesale slaughter of the Canaanites, Moses's butchery of the Midianites, and David's brutal extermination of the Ammonites and cruel murder of prisoners of war—men, women, and children—by putting them under saws and harrows of iron, and cutting them with axes, and roasting them in brick kilns! According to God's command (please excuse me for either honoring, worshiping, or believing in such a God), I hav often heard intelligent Christians defend lying from the Bible. They said by divine direction the Israelites lied to obtain the jewels of the Egyptians. By God's direction Joshua deceived the men of Ai and took their city. They referred also to the contemptible subterfuge he directed Samuel to adopt to save his life when he went to anoint David, and to the command God gave his servant, to "go and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all Ahab's prophets, so that Micaiah could say, 'Now, therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets.'" These and many other similar passages satisfied every Christian liar that his practice was right. But, perhaps, the most wholesale sanction of evil and evil-doers is found in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews. Here men and women whom our laws would imprison or hang, and all decent people would shun and loathe, are indorsed as God's faithful friends (of whom the world was not worthy), whose example we must follow if we would please God and inherit heaven. Among these are Abraham, with his sister, wife, and concubines, who banished his servant girl, whom he had seduced, with his illegitimate infant son, to perish in the wilderness; Rahab, the harlot; Jael, who treacherously murdered her weary, sleeping, confiding guest, whom she had promised to protect; Jephthah, who offered up as a burnt offering his innocent and only daughter; David, with his multitudes of wives and concubines, his murderous robber raids, etc., etc. Such teaching tends to subvert all morality. What wonder that the Mormons are enthusiastic believers in, and defenders of, the inspiration of the Bible, and claim to be the only church that believes and practices all its teachings? Deut. xiii, 6–10, justifies the murder of heretics. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," not only established the foolish doctrin of witchcraft but made it the duty of Presbyterians in Scotland and elsewhere and Puritans in New England to murder them.

During our Revolution, John Wesley and his Bible-believing, Tory friends, in the name of God, Peter, and Paul, denounced the damnation of hell on Washington and his compeers, because they would resist and not honor and submit to King George III. In short, the Bible has been quoted by its friends and authorized expounders, in defense of war, slavery, intemperance, polygamy, concubinage, lying, persecution, and nearly every immorality, as well as against the truths of astronomy, geology, and nearly every science that has engaged the minds of thinkers since the advent of Christianity. The age of science and progress which has now dawned upon the world was retarded more than a thousand years by Christian ignorance, tyranny, and bigotry, backed by the Bible. It seems to me, in view of these facts, that the influence of the church and Bible on Christendom has been exceedingly unfortunate. With this conviction, the argument in favor of inspiration drawn from the "internal evidence," seemed an entire failure. I then examined the external evidence with a similar result. According to the Rev. Wm. Brown, D.D., in his work entitled "Jewish Antiquities," a standard orthodox work: "The books of the Old Testament were first revised and arranged by Ezra, B.C. 444, the other members of the Great Synagog carried on the work, and Simon the Just completed the canon of the Old Testament by adding 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Malachi, of which 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Esther are supposed to hav been written by Ezra, and Nehemiah and Malachi by those whose names they bear." We are indebted, indeed, for a complete, corrected, and revised edition of the Old Testament, to Ezra, the Jewish Synagog, and a Jew called Simon. The authors of many of the books of the Bible are unknown, and few, if any, are certainly known, but certain persons are supposed to hav written them. On the authority of Dr. Brown, a large number of Jews, most of whose names, even, we never heard, and of most of whose characters we know nothing, tinkered at the Old Testament for 153 years, and at the close one man, who seemed to hav great influence, added six books on his own authority, some of which, by some learned Christian writers, are thought to be apocryphal, and should not be in the canon. Now, I believe, no one claims that these Jews were inspired. Christ had a very poor opinion of the leaders of the synagog in his day, and yet, I suppose, they were quite as good as they had been four hundred years before. These men revised their scriptures just as they saw fit, adding books and parts of books, and rejecting others, according to their whims and educational prejudices, and it seems to me that to say that a book got up by a class of men noted in all those times for hypocrisy and wickedness, was inspired by God, thus making him responsible for all the mistakes, follies, and absurdities it might contain, would be to insult, rather than honor, God. Before I dare say a book is inspired, I must know that it is, else I may lie. But, how can I know, how can you or anyone know, that the authors of the Old Testament were controled by any other spirit than their own? Prof. Moses Stuart says that 1 Sam. xvii, 54, is manifestly a very unskilful interpolation, because it is an incorrect historical statement—that is, a falsehood. Did God inspire a lie? And if that verse is untrue, how do we know that the next verse is true and inspired, or, indeed, any part of the book? I hav, absolutely, no proof of it. Hav you? Then I investigated the claims of the New Testament to inspiration and they seemed no better sustained than those of the Old. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his commentary, says there are three incorrect historical statements in the ninth verse of the first chapter of Matthew, which means three falsehoods, and according to Chronicles, the charge is true. Did God inspire those falsehoods? And if Matthew deliberately wrote three lies in one gospel, how are we to know that he did not write ten times as many more before he reached the end of it?

If a person, narrating certain events to me, states a deliberate falsehood at the outset, he might just as well stop. I hav no more use for him or his statements, and, if I had any respect for God, or the truth, I would not say he was inspired. And when he told me an unreasonable story, I would unhesitatingly reject it as a lie. If the mother of Jesus, speaking of him, said, as Luke ii, 48, says she did, that Joseph was his father, I could believe it against the oath of ten thousand Matthews that he was a ghost. Yet, if this unreasonable and utterly unproved ghost story is false, the whole supernatural part of your "plan of salvation" falls like the house built on the sand. Peter told three deliberate lies, and then swore to them, and years afterward, when Paul met him at Antioch (Gal. ii, 11), he "withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed" (verse 13), "and the other Jews dissembled likewise, with him [Peter], insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation." Here we find him lying again, and leading Barnabas (a brother minister) and a number of Christian Jews to lie with him, so that the apostle, and it would seem the whole Christian church at Antioch, stood before the public as a band of convicted liars, showing that the apostle's lying, as well as that of the early Christians, was not the result of sudden and powerful temptations, but an ingrained propensity. The Catholic church, that most unscrupulous liar, did a very appropriate thing when she selected Peter as her patron saint. Although Paul, on this occasion, administered a just and severe reproof to Peter, his own practice was scarcely better than his. Speaking of himself, he said, "Being crafty I caught you with guile," and "If the truth of God hath abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" (Rom. iii, 7). Paul givs a practical explanation of his meaning in these passages, in Acts xxi, where he and the "elders," at Jerusalem, deliberately planned and executed a scheme for the avowed purpose of deceiving the brethren ("the thousands that believe"), and making them believe a lie with regard to the teachings of Paul, and an important doctrin of the Christian faith. Now if the leading apostles and writers of the New Testament could deliberately tell lies and swear to them, and plot and act lies, to deceive the brethren, might they not also write them for the same purpose? And how do we know that they did not? It would be acting in accord with their former practice. Is it strange that their successors—the Christian fathers of the first and succeeding centuries—should be liars on principle? So that Mosheim, the standard church historian, could truly write of them that they deemed it "an act of virtue to deceive and lie" to advance religion? That they "flooded the world with spurious books, filled with pious frauds and fabulous wonders, and in order to giv them weight forged to them the names of important personages?" These lying fathers wrote hundreds of books—"Gospels, Epistles, Acts, and Revelations," so that, as Mosheim intimates, it became a matter of extreme difficulty to separate the true from the false. He says, concerning the time when and the persons by whom the books of the New Testament were collected into one volume, there are various opinions, or rather conjectures, of the learned. Dr. Lardner says that the Testament canon was not authoritativly settled until the seventh century, and when it was done it was by ignorant and utterly unreliable Catholic councils. Professor Newman proves that our four gospels were not known to the early Christians until the latter part of the second century, at which time they were probably written, and were first mentioned by Ireneus. Now, how can I know that books written by such men and in such an age are true? Even if we were certain that the originals had been perfect, they hav been copied and recopied, translated and re-translated, by men who would change their truth into a lie as a religious duty, if they thought by so doing they could advance their views of religion; and how can I know, how can you or anyone know, that they did not do so? Dr. Clarke and other eminent Christian writers tell us that they did so. For example, 1 John v, 7, "For three that bear record," etc., was thus added to support the absurd pagan doctrin of the trinity.

According to orthodoxy, about eighteen hundred years ago God wanted a book written, one that would be absolutely true and reliable, and one that all must believe and accept as divine, or be damned to eternal fire. As the principal writers of this book, he employed men who had proved themselvs capable of writing, speaking, and acting deliberate falsehoods, and then had them write it, not in good, honest Hebrew—the language of the country where the events recorded were said to hav occurred—but in corrupt Greek, which Campbell calls "a barbarous idiom," and Bishop Middleton says of it: "The scripture Greek is utterly rude and barbarous, and abounds with every fault that can deform a language," and then left it to be copied, translated, and preserved for fifteen hundred years by the Catholic church—herself the most unscrupulous liar, forger, and perverter of truth that ever cursed the earth or disgraced the human race. In view of which facts, even if there were no positiv testimony on the subject, it would still be ten thousand to one that it had been altered and perverted. Yet orthodoxy demands that we believe in its original and continuous absolute divine purity on pain of eternal damnation, all of which, to my mind, is the climax of unreasonable absurdity. Now I do not claim infallibility. I may be mistaken. All I seek is the truth. Convince me that I am in error, and I will thank you and act accordingly. But do not threaten me with hell. I am too far on for that. Nor tell me that I hate the truth, for that would be false and do neither of us any good. Neither need you try to frighten me with the horrors of Infidel death-beds. I hav, myself, been down so near the gates of death that I did not expect to get back, but I was not in the least alarmed. I hav stood beside the death-bed of Infidels, but there were no horrors. All was peace. And why not? The Materialist, having spent his life in seeking after truth and trying to increase the sum of human happiness, calmly resigns himself, as he believes, to a peaceful, restful, dreamless, eternal sleep. The Spiritualist joins the loved ones who hav gone before, and under much more favorable circumstances commences anew with them a purer, higher, happier life. The most unhappy death-bed scene I ever witnessed was that of an honest, pious, Christian neighbor, who had serious doubts as to his own salvation, and believing as he did in an intensely hot, eternal hell, of course his situation was frightful and horrible. I can conceive of no system so well calculated to murder joy and happiness as the Christian system. You will agree that it banishes happiness pretty thoroughly out of hell, and before one can be happy in heaven, in full view of father, mother, wife, and children, or friends roasting alive in eternal fire, he must be dehumanized and transformed into a being a compound of brute and fiend. Our London Letter.

Certain pious men, members of the "Lord's Day Observance Society," hav once more stood up on their hind legs and brayed. They strenuously object to the rational use and enjoyment of Sunday, and would hav everyone driven into conventicles to listen to inane vaporings, only enlivened by vivid illustrations of the future joy of the saints in witnessing the tortures of the unregenerate in the good old-fashioned hell of Calvin. It is a very sore point with the elect that people will obstinately persist in risking the future welfare of their immortal souls by going to the public parks to enjoy fresh air and fairly good instrumental music. It stands to reason that the ordinary individual will prefer lying on the grass in the cool of the evening, well in reach of the strains of a band, in preference to roasting two hours in a stuffy building listening to the drivel of a gospel grinder. All the same, it is rough on the soul-saver's business, for those who don't patronize their shops don't care about paying the shopkeepers, and so the latter are only fighting for their bread and butter, of which they would not get so good a supply in any other walk in life. The stock excuse of the Sabbatarian party is, that their great objection to the secularization of the Sunday is the fear that eventually it will lead to a compulsory continuation of all work for seven days a week; this statement has induced a number to take this side of the question who would otherwise not do so, but in these days of workers' combinations the tendency is toward less work and more pay, so there is very little fear of such fears being realized; but, of course, this is only an excuse, and nothing more. They dare not giv the real reason, or their objections to rational enjoyment would be swept away, together with themselvs, which would be a good thing for society generally, though not, perhaps, for them individually.

The "Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge" hav issued a circular in reply to the charge brought against them some time back by Mr. W. Besant. He accused them of the very worst kind of sweating, and instead of refuting the charge they simply plead that they hav a perfect right to make as much profit as they can. They admit making a considerable annual profit on their capital, but place against the statement that they distribute gratis £12,000 worth of their publications annually. This valuation is their own, and no doubt far in excess of the truth. I hav seen many of their publications, though never one of any value; but taking cost of material and labor that sum would represent a very respectable library. The committee rather pride themselvs on the fact that they can get the copyright of a book for a lesser amount than can publishers who don't distribute "Christian knowledge," and with such capabilities for driving a keen bargain they still appeal to the public to subscribe to the fund for the support of the society. I wonder they should hav taken the trouble to notice the charge, as the people who subscribe so freely to this and kindred societies would never be convinced of their disreputable actions.

The bishop of Peterborough has lately distinguished himself by introducing a bill to Parliament for the purpose of abolishing infant life assurance, or in the alternativ, causing the money to be paid by the insurance company direct to the undertaker. This father in God has shown a good specimen of the love bishops bear to their flocks; this particular one fully exemplifies the charity that thinketh no evil, which all Christians possess so largely. His opinion is that all wealthy persons are model parents, all poor persons hold infanticide as a great moral necessity. His great scholarship and intellectuality never showed him that if all children insured, or the majority of them, were disposed of as soon as the policy was effected, no insurance company could exist a month. The great dignitaries of the church are deep thinkers and powerful observers, so they say. J. D.

Failure of Secularism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: 1. Did not the retreat of the Liberal army begin years ago when the Liberal congress permitted the church to frighten it away from its demand that the mails of the United States be absolutely free for the use of all citizens, leaving individual offenders responsible for their acts?

2. Supervision of the mails by the pious tools of the church ought to hav been condemned by Liberals everywhere. No Paul Prys of the church, or holy Pecksniffs, ought to hav been allowed to lay their hands on the mail service of the United States.

3. Liberals, in congress assembled, should hav declared that while the Christians' standard of morals, the Bible, with all its vulgarity, and, as Noah Webster said, "many words and phrases very offensiv to delicacy, and even to decency," is circulated, no other book of equal impurity should be interdicted.

4. The church, outwardly fair and pure as a whited sepulcher, but full of rottenness within, raised the cry of "obscenity" against the once brave old League, and the League hauled down its flag and changed its name. But the church has stuck to its ancient habit of lying for Christ's sake. It does not matter what your name is, if you are not a Christian, it is a part of Christian duty to damn you in this world, as the Christian sincerely believes it is his God's duty to damn you in the next. The Liberal League made an ostrich of itself, buried its head in the sands of obloquy. It had a far better character than the church ever had, and purer members than are found in many fashionable religious societies to-day.

Judge Westbrook and his co-laborers say there is needed "a more systematic advertising of the cause;" "the tendency of the time is toward consolidation and coöperation." "If Liberals are to hold their own against their opponents they must be welded together into one solid organization." "The peril to our religious liberties presses fast upon us." I believe every word of it. Unless Liberals heed these words of warning there will be in this country more than a peaceful clash of opinions. I am ready to join hands with the Union in any practical way. Twenty years ago I put my last dollar in the "Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic," now out of print. Every year is confirming the warnings of that book. The self-satisfied assurance of many Liberals then was, "Oh! there's no danger!" Some of the old soldiers of the "Liberal army," as Brother Westbrook calls it, are no longer with us. Bennett is gone. Seaver is gone. Denton is gone. The aged Chase is with us, and Pillsbury, and Hacker. But where is Francis E. Abbott, founder of the Liberal League? Where is Frothingham? Where is Fox? Where is Chainey? Some of them enlisted on the other side. And the black cloud of Christian rule is covering the American sky.

Permit me to say to the officers, that their estimate, "Liberals outnumber the church party ten to one," I think is a gross exaggeration, and a mischievous one; for your quiet Liberals will be led to sleep on it. Who is afraid, if we outnumber the enemy ten times over? If the Liberals outnumber the church party ten to one, what are they doing? And where are they? By careful calculations made during thirty years' lecture travels, and almost constant mingling with Liberals and Christians, I find that the Christians pay dollars for the support of Christianity where Liberals pay cents to sustain lectures and periodicals. In nearly every village there are three, four, five, and more churches, with a preacher for each church. If there are ten Liberals to one of the church, then we are driven to the conclusion that Liberals are the greatest moral cowards in the universe; for, in many towns, you will find that one Christian can frighten ten Liberals into ignominious silence. I hav within the past year talked with some such Liberals, and they solemnly declared that it would not do for them to identify themselvs publicly with the Liberal movement—it would ruin their business! That is, one Christian would ruin ten Liberals!

A Relic of Barbarism.

From the Evening Sun.

The trustees of the Metropolitan museum probably do not realize that their course in keeping that institution closed to the public on Sundays is as distinctly a relic of barbarism as the practice of human slavery. It is a relic of a period when the human conscience was in a state of slavery to ecclesiastical tyranny. Dearly as they cherished political freedom, the men who settled this country were fanatical and bigoted in their religious ideas. They were determined men, but gloomy and fierce. They were single-minded and narrow-minded. They scourged and burnt their fellow-creatures for conscience's sake. Their social polity was an ecclesiastical polity. Their ministers were an earnest but a bitter lot, and ruled them with grim rigor. They invented a Puritan Sabbath, modeled upon that of the Jewish Pharisees. The dead hands of the Mathers are they which turn the keys of the People's picture-house to-day.

The like is not now to be matched in Christendom. It is an anachronism. It is a bit out of the seventeenth century. It is a cinder from the witch fires. It is a thong from the whip that flogged the Quakers. It is worse, for those performances were honest: this is not. Those were the acts of men who had the courage of their convictions. That was zeal: this is hypocrisy. That stood for the law and the prophets: this for the scribe and the Pharisee.

The trustees of the Metropolitan museum are not sacrificing to the God of the sanctuary: they are sacrificing to its pews. They are not sacrificing their own substance, any way: they are sacrificing those from whom they withhold the spiritual bread whereof they are the trustees and almoners. In their faithfulness to themselvs they are faithless to their trust. They ought to be above making broad the phylacteries and posing where they can be seen of men in an attitude of prayer. There is a certain dreadful doom they might take to heart and ponder: "Forasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of these——" The phylacteries will not help when they come to giv account of a stewardship that is to be tried first of all by the test, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. It is not love, nor humanity, nor charity, nor any Christian grace that locks out the people from the old masters of form and color on the people's day of rest. For art in its last analysis is worship.

FOR some centuries before the introduction of Christianity, patriotism was in most countries the presiding moral principle, and religion occupied an entirely subordinate position.—Lecky.

Agnosticism, as the Religion of the Future.

If I were asked the question: What are the prospects of Agnosticism at the present time? I would hav to answer that they are very poor, although I am a very enthusiastic Agnostic, and firmly believe that it is destined to be the religion of the future. Agnosticism, in its true, broad conception, does not consist in a mere denial of the existence of God, as an anthropomorphic deity or a metempirical supreme being. This is merely one factor, or rather a conclusion following out of premises having a much broader foundation. Agnosticism, in its broad, essentially progressiv sense, means much more than that. It is synonymous, namely, with the reign of rationality, of pure reason, understood not according to Kant's nonsensical doctrin of its twelve categories, but as a reason pure and clear of all kinds of prejudices and superstitions, and which would conform itself to no other laws but the laws of its own logic, which are identical with the laws of nature. I am aware that, at the present time, it is almost impossible to find a mind fully answering these requirements, even amongst the leading Agnostics. There is nothing surprising in that, and it would be rather an unaccountable phenomenon if such a person could be found. Conceived in superstitions, we come into this world with potentialities inimical to sound reasoning. Education, our surroundings, and intercourse with our fellow-men, the majority of whom are a personification of perverted logic, stifle as a matter of course every tendency in us toward a manifestation of independence in reasoning. Therefore, it requires some very favorable natural propensities and unobtrusiv surroundings for a man to be able to shake off entirely the prejudices and superstitions which are arraying themselvs against him on all sides. This is also partly the cause that Agnosticism is so slowly recognized, and that we find but few Agnostics yet.

But, to get rid of religious prejudices of our days is far from constituting the whole of Agnosticism. Our political institutions are as much of a lie and swindle, as the religion is. Our economic conditions are such a flagrant violation of natural rights and justice, that they would hav long ago produced a subversion of such an order amongst bees, ants, and all those animals who hav socialistic tendencies implanted in them by nature. Our sciences are tissues woven out of spurious threads, in which truth appears only sporadic, entangled into lies advanced by unwarrantable ambitions and invented by servility, while its object is prostituted in every sentence for the sake of advancing personal interests of its professors, who are nothing but contemptible traitors. In order to be a true Agnostic, a man must be not only an Agnostic in religion, but he ought to be just as well an Agnostic in politics, an Agnostic in economic matters, and an Agnostic in science.

The meaning of Agnosticism in regard to religious matters being so well established in our days, thanks to the efforts of such clear-headed men as R. Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and others, it remains for me to explain what I mean by that term applied to the other three spheres of human activity.

To be an Agnostic in politics means, in the first place, not to hav any patriotism. It is the appeal to this absurd notion that was used by political rulers and sharks whenever they wanted other people to pull the chestnuts for them out of the fire. It was this cry also that prompted the South to fight for the conservation of their chattel rights in the negroes' flesh, and which armed the Northern states for the abolition of slavery. History, however, notwithstanding the recency of the last war, has had time enough to disclose already that there was no more patriotism involved in this case than there could be discovered of a religious spirit in the Crusades. From immemorial time this word was invented by greedy oppressors in order to cover up and justify the slaughtering of human beings by each other, a phenomenon unobserved yet among the most rapacious animals. Not "Ubi bene, ubi patria," but "Ubi bene, ibi patria," should be the motto of every Agnostic. In the second place, to be a true Agnostic in politics means to hav no affiliation with any political party, for every existing form of government, whether monarchical or republican, is nothing but an imposition, perpetuated by deception and rude force. And any party or faction, no matter how attractivly may be worded their platform, cannot be anything else but a pack of hunters after the spoil, who are supported by a numerous retinue of fools, whom the leaders pull by their nose in the direction of the expected boodle. This was the true origin of all kinds of political states and powers. If the political parties were not after the spoil, they would not be political parties.

To be an Agnostic in economic matters is to understand that every man who appropriates, traffics, and sells products of another man's labor or his services is a swindler, a grabber, an oppressor, trying to make a living and to get rich by robbing his fellowmen of what belongs to them individually or collectivly. The fruits of a man's work should not, namely, belong to anybody but either the worker himself or all other human beings, considered collectivly but not individually. All economic iniquities of our present outrageous system can be traced to the violation of this fundamental principle.

In regard to the Agnosticism in science, the same must be based on a complete emancipation from all authorities, no matter of how high or of how old a standing they may be. This does not present much difficulty relativly to the dead ones, but is attended with a considerable amount of unpleasant friction and material sacrifices of quite an inconvenient nature, when the question comes about exposing the spuriousness of some of the living authorities, because they never stand isolated and hav at their tail a long line of followers, ready to support them, surrounded by numerous other authorities on their both sides, not less prominent, who become uneasy when they see that one of their caste is in danger of being knocked down.

The true Agnostic, though, must disregard all that, and remember that there never was a scientific man who had not advanced some sort of nonsense about something. The errors of judgment, however, are excusable in such men, like Descartes or Newton, as they are amply atoned by the great services they hav rendered to humanity in their special fields of inquiry. But, in the case of small scientific fry of our days, no such circumstance can be thrown in the scale of the opposit side. For the majority of them, the more mixed up they make a science, the surer they can make a living out of it.

I am very sorry that the want of space prevents me from enlarging upon this interesting question, as I hav hardly room enough to say why I believe that Agnosticism is destined to become the religion of the future.

When the human mind has got rid of all that which centuries of religious, political, economic, and scientific swindle hav ingrafted on it, what kind of faith can it hav, but the faith in its own ability to reason soundly? What kind of religion can it hav, but the religion of its own logic, always identical with the logic of concrete and abstract realities? And if all humanity reaches that state, there is no doubt that Agnosticism must be the only possible religion under the circumstances. What outward forms it will assume, it is beyond anybody's ability to foretell, because a long time necessarily will elapse before it is reached, and science may, in the mean time, discover new properties and phenomena in nature of which the most unchecked imagination now can hardly make a conception. This, as a matter of course, will modify man's intellectual life in such a manner that the sources of conflicts and sufferings will be entirely removed, and a reign of pure reason, coupled with happiness, will be permanently established on our poor, evil-overridden earth of the present day. EDWARD L. STARCK.

Campaigning in Washington.

Eagle Harbor, northwest by west from Seattle, about seven miles across the bay, is one of the most lovely spots for a quiet home anywhere on the sound. It is admirably located, forming one of the best and safest of harbors. The land has a gentle southern slope, and in very many places affords grand views of the sound, the city of Seattle, Mount Rainier, the Cascades, and the Olympian mountains. Steamers and sail craft of every size and description can be seen passing in and out of Elliott bay.

The adjoining peninsula, jutting into the bay to the east, is known as Madrono Park, and is owned by our stanch Liberal friend, D. S. Ebersold. He has laid out several acres in home tracts, or residence lots, which are selling very rapidly, for Madrono Park and Eagle Harbor will soon become the most popular of summer resorts, and the home of wealthy merchants and professional men who desire to enjoy all the retirement, quiet, and delights of country life, while yet in easy access of the city.

The land of Eagle Harbor is uncommonly rich and productiv. Apples, peaches, pears, plums, cherries, prunes, berries, vegetables, flowers, clover, and timothy grass all grow in luxuriant perfection.

Father Ryan and his ever jolly, energetic, and estimable wife were among the early settlers. They hav a happy, cosy home with splendid orchards and gardens. Their house is the favorit resort for all the young folks of the island. They all delight to congregate in the old Infidel's home, where innocent mirth and jovial hospitality abound.

I hav twice delivered lectures at the little schoolhouse. Eagle Harbor is sparsely settled, no village or anything approaching it, yet I secured eight good and true outspoken Infidels as members of the Washington Secular Union.

At Port Blakely, the adjoining harbor, with the great shipbuilding yard and lumber mill, I held a discussion—at least, so it was advertised—with a Rev. Mr. Wilcox, Congregational minister, who claims to hav been a missionary to Africa. The discussion was announced for four nights. He at first agreed to hold the discussion at Eagle Harbor, but failed to put in an appearance. Subsequently he wrote me his people at the Harbor were opposed to his holding a discussion, but if I would consent to hold it at Blakely his people there were interested, and he would guarantee a very large attendance. Twice he postponed it, needing longer time to prepare to affirm "That Jesus Was the Savior of the World" and "That There is a God." He made the most wretched failure. It was absolutely pitiable. God must hav been dreadfully hard up for preaching timber when he had to use such refuse. The preacher declared that before he was converted he was a low gambler, a drunkard; that he reveled in obscenity and licentiousness; used to go to revival meetings with a whisky bottle in his pocket. That was the nearest approach he made to any statement of facts. He declared that gambling, drunkenness, and obscenity were Infidelity. The second evening he commenced his second speech with a silly tirade against Colonel Ingersoll, and two-thirds of the audience left in disgust. The third night he refused to debate, and said he would listen to me and reply to what I said at his church next Sunday. I proceeded in my lecture by reading letters from two gentlemen of Keene Valley, N. Y., who at my last lecture at Eagle Harbor he declared had, with some eighteen other Seventh Day Adventists, at first kept Saturday as Sabbath and worked Sunday, soon kept no day, and in a little while become all outspoken Infidels. Letters from two, the only ones whose names he could remember, declared the statement a malicious lie, made of whole cloth, without the faintest shadow of fact to sustain it. There was no Seventh Day Adventist church at Keene Valley while Rev. Mr. Wilcox was there. No Adventist had turned Infidel; least of all had they. Their statements were certified as truth by the postmaster of Keene Valley, and corroborated by the president of the New York conference of Seventh Day Adventists. I gave him opportunity to explain or make defense. His writhing and squirming was pitiable. He had to acknowledge there was no Adventist church there while he was there. His defense was: "You are a mean man to write to those gentlemen. They were friends of mine. If I had thought you would hav written to them I would never hav given you their names. You do not do as you would be done by." And yet this minister of Christ had from his "sacred desk," as well as in conversation, deplored the spread of Infidelity because it destroyed Christian morality! I delivered the letters to one of the most influential citizens of Eagle Harbor, lest any question of their genuinness should arise in my absence.

The lecture I delivered was listened to with eager attention, and many of the leading men of Blakely requested I would at my earliest convenience return and deliver a course of lectures there.

Rev. Mr. Wilcox has expressed his intention to try for a chance to return to his missionary work in Africa, and I am assured no voice of Infidel or Christian in either Blakely or Eagle Harbor has been heard to protest.

I was at Montesano July 19th and 20th. This is the county seat of Chehalis county, one of the largest counties in the giant state of Washington, and also one of the richest in timber, agriculture, minerals, fisheries, etc. In the matter of location the city of Montesano is most favorably and advantageously situated, and beyond doubt will become one of the most important cities on the coast between the straits of Fuca and the Columbia river. It also givs promis of becoming the railroad center of the Harbor basin and the Chehalis valley. The Puget Sound and Gray's Harbor railroad has completed its line to Montesano. The town was a good, substantial trading center long before a railroad started for the Gray's Harbor country. The lumbermen first came; then the farmers, in steadily increasing numbers, taking up lands along the river and creek bottoms where they could be easily cleared, and supplying with their crops, beef, and dairy products the needs of the sturdy loggers. The city of Montesano has no boom, but a steady, legitimate growth, and the lucky purchasers of town lots, two years ago, hav solid financial reasons for joy. The adjacent country has excellent conditions for general farming, dairying, and stockraising. It is estimated that not over a fourth of these bottom lands are now occupied. Government surveys hav not yet reached all of them, but will probably do so this year. Settlers who come this year can find good claims and plenty of work at good wages, logging, teaming, sawing, etc. The kind of people who should come are those with push, energy, persistent industry, sobriety, and economy. These are sure to do well. The young taking up claims, on reaching middle age are reasonably certain to hav attained a competency. But lacking any of the attributes named, success is proportionately uncertain. Those having capital, with exercise of ordinary care and judgment can readily find investments in town or country property, sure of rapid rise in value. For full particulars in regard to Montesano and adjacent country, write to Henry Knust, Germania Land Office, Montesano, Wash., or Frank Lessman, same address.

The local institution of which Montesano residents are most proud is their electric light plant, owned by the city, and costing $12,000.

The most interesting attraction for Liberals is the fact that at the last election the Liberals decided to break up the corrupt political ring, and nominated a full straight Liberal ticket. The ministers all rallied, worked, and exhorted the Christians to put forth every effort and down the wicked Infidels. Result—the Liberals elected fourteen of their sixteen candidates, and the whole community is now rejoicing at the excellent and efficient administration that is now in office.

On Saturday evening, July 19th, at the Opera House, to a very large audience, I delivered a lecture on "The Lord's Prayer in our Public Schools." A Campbellite reverend was present, and greatly annoyed all in his vicinity by his noisy and ungentlemanly conduct. At the conclusion of the lecture I invited questions. He arose and expressed a desire to reply to my lecture, and that I would meet him and discuss the question on Monday evening. I inquired of our lecture committee if we could hav the Opera House; the owners said we could. At great personal inconvenience Mrs. Reynolds and I stayed over. Monday evening the expectation of the discussion brought out an immense crowd. At 8 o'clock I took a seat upon the platform, to which, on his arrival, I invited the reverend Campbellite, and suggested the election by the audience of a chairman. He claimed he would behave himself without a chairman. I doubted, and two or three persons were proposed by the audience, but declined. The reverend then declared he wanted the whole time—and mark his reason for such a demand. He said I had taken all the time on Saturday night and on Sunday afternoon; my wife had taken all the time on Sunday evening, and now I objected to letting him occupy all the time to-night. This was, he said, a fair specimen of Liberals' liberality, and he commenced a tirade of abuse and vituperation, seeming to hav a special spite against the Liberals of Liberal, Mo. I insisted on appointment of a chairman who would compel the reverend to confine himself to the subject of debate, instead of indulging in wild ranting and denunciation. Capt. G. W. Bell was nominated for chairman, and he being held in high esteem by all classes, his name called forth enthusiastic applause. This proved a red rag to the reverend. He roared and pranced about the platform like an infuriated bull, bellowing out in intensity of impotent rage, "Bell! Captain Bell! An Infidel! A loud-mouthed In-fi-del!"

Captain Bell walked calmly to the platform and in a gentle, but earnest, manner delivered a scathing rebuke to the reverend blusterer, whose only qualification for debate was the possession and reckless use of a weapon similar to that with which Samson slew the Philistines; and he used his as a boomerang, exciting derision and contempt of his opponents but dealing destruction to those on his own side. When he first stated his desire to occupy all the time I suggested it was true Campbellite modesty to make such a demand when the Liberals had hired the hall and would hav the rent to pay. He then assured us he could raise his share of the rent. While Captain Bell was addressing the audience, one of the reverend's disciples sneaked out, found the janitor and paid him the rent of the hall for the night, and returned and declared he had paid the rent and no one but Disciples had a right to speak. While Brother Knust, chairman of the Liberal lecture committee, was addressing the audience, the reverend started in on another foul tirade of abuse. The Rev. Mr. Samson tried to prevent, but the audience insisted I should be heard and the reverend collapsed. I announced that since the reverend Campbellite had obtained the presence of the people under false pretenses, and it was self-evident he did not intend or desire to discuss my lecture on "The Use of the Lord's Prayer in Our Public Schools," but simply wanted to giv vent to splenetic misrepresentations and billingsgate, taking advantage of contemptible trickery to obtain a questionable right to the hall for the sole purpose of preventing any refutation of his willful misrepresentations, Liberals had no further business there, and we would retire. About two-thirds of the audience withdrew with me.

The people of Montesano were in no sense responsible for the Campbellite reverend's conduct. In fact, they were even more disgusted than myself.

The Washington Democrat, the leading paper in the county, gave a complimentary notice of the lectures of both my wife and self, concluding with: "Many church-members were present, and gave close attention to his words. He was not abusiv in his language, and for this gained golden opinions in Montesano."

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Secretary Washington Secular Union.

A DEBATE in Kasson, Minn., between Jamieson and Nichols, is not likely to take place as early as anticipated. Mr. Jamieson was expecting to take steamer up the Mississippi river to fill his lecture engagement in Princeton, Minn., the second week in August. Liberals in Minnesota desiring courses of lectures should address him at Princeton, Minn., until further notice.

Sam Jones on Infidels and Society.

From a Recent Sermon.

I'd rather be a low-down, chain-gang negro than one of your little Infidels. You won't be in hell two minutes before you'll be hopping around in the fire and yelling, "What a mistake I made." I hav some respect for Bob Ingersoll, because he can get $200 a night for his lecturing. But some of these little fellows are Infidels for nothing, pay $2 to hear Ingersoll, and board themselvs. I understand you are all running "society" here pretty lively. Society! A pair of seventy-five cent slippers and a $1.25 wasp bonnet lets you into it. There is no manhood, no womanhood, in it. The fruits of society, so called, are the dude and dudine. If you don't like what I'm saying, just get up on your hind legs and slide out.

REPLY BY A LITTLE INFIDEL.

Such contempt for ordinary men and women, such respect for the rich and powerful, is characteristic of sensational, money-making preachers. Faith is their virtue, theology their practice, and money-making their object. No doubt Mr. Jones despises from the bottom of his heart the impecunious little Infidel, for such a man givs him nothing; and he despises the woman who wears plain clothes, for she puts a widow's mite in the contribution-box and never subscribes to the list of wealthy men. He also despises the negro, who sends him no tribute. And he dismisses us all with a characteristic slang phrase which marks the degradation of his opinion.

He exaggerates, however, when he says that he would rather be a low-down, chain-gang negro than a little Infidel without money.

The truth is, he would rather be a rich negro, or a rich Chinaman, or rich anybody else, than a poor man, let him be Infidel or believer. The main thing with him is money. He would rather be a low-down, high-toned, absconding ex-cashier who stole money from a savings bank and went into Canada. Such a thief as that has Mr. Sam Jones's unqualified respect. He would not object to being one, especially since they go into that gilt-edge society that has the manhood and womanhood which he admires—the manhood and womanhood that decks itself with fine clothes, wears beautiful $10 shoes and exquisitly fine hats. And then the odor of the sanctity arising from those quandam Sunday-school teachers is perfectly edifying.

Mr. Jones says "he respects Bob Ingersoll because he makes $200 a night lecturing." No doubt he does. No doubt he would like to swap places with Colonel Ingersoll—for the money. He respects the $200 a night, not Colonel Ingersoll. The reason that he givs is consistent with his practices, characteristic of his tribe; it shows that he respects the money and not the man. Money is his god, and not the man. Money is his god; he worships dimes and dollars. After saying that he respects so great a man as Colonel Ingersoll because of the $200 a night, he had as well admit that his own self-respect depends, not on his honor and convictions, but on the money that comes in from the contribution-box. This explains why he used to be a drunkard. He made no money at law, consequently he had no respect for himself, and got drunk to forget his poverty and shame. It is impossible for him to control a natural appetite. He tried that on cigars, and after a big blow and boast failed.

If he expects that his base admission will gain him the esteem or friendship of Colonel Ingersoll he deceives himself. It would profit him considerably to read some Infidel works in order to learn that honor is superior to faith, that humanity is better than theology, and that the heathen virtues are more godlike than money-getting.

In the sixth interview on Talmage Colonel Ingersoll says: "According to Mr. Talmage I made the mistake of preserving my manhood and losing an office. If I had only been elected governor of Illinois, that is to say, if I had been a successful hypocrit, I might now be basking in the sunshine of this gentleman's respect. I preferred to tell the truth—to be an honest man—and I hav never regretted the course I hav pursued." This extract shows what estimate an honest man places upon the professions of a hypocrit; how indifferent he is to the opinions of Rev. Sam Jones, for instance. Pious frauds hunt for rich pulpits all over the land, and hate Infidelity because it makes credulous pockets scarce. When men and women realize the folly of paying their substance for the consolation of delusiv hopes, and for the expected light of the next world that has never fallen upon man in this, then, and not till then, will this tribe of Levi become extinct and their occupation gone. Hence their hatred of Infidelity.

The religion of the Infidel is free, practical, and liberal; it is too sensible to be jealous, too reasonable to be sensitiv—good-fellowship and equal rights for all, regardless of birth, possessions, or pretensions, respect for men and women because they are equals; respect for women who wear fine clothes, for women who wear faded clothes, and for women whose heads and feet are bare. Jesus of Nazareth was an Infidel and respected every class except the hypocrits; he in turn was despised and hated and crucified by them, and they were men of Mr. Jones's cloth. They hated a free gospel. They wanted sacrifices, which were meat and money to them. We Infidels respect Jesus as a man, but not as a god. We consider his mission a failure, because he was not understood, and his church has been the greatest persecutor and tyrant over thought that ever was on earth. His chief apostle killed a poor man and his wife because they kept back a part of the price of their land from his holy apostolic clutches. And since then, the leaders, the chief priests, and the sensational preachers, in every age, hav inherited the venom, hate, and cruelty of those scribes and high priests which crucified for blasphemy a mild man because he preached a free gospel. The Jews complained to the Romans that they could not legally execute St. Paul; and no doubt Rev. Sam Jones complains to Jesus because he cannot kill the little Infidels.

We reverence the names of Voltaire and Paine. We reverence them as men, and not as gods, because they were the declared enemies of cruelty and of oppression; and because they made freedom possible in France, and independence possible in America. Their works and their worth are more fully appreciated and better understood as this age of enlightenment advances, and as knowledge increases. The same may be said of whatever else is true and great—of religion if it be true and not false.

LITTLE INFIDEL.

The Work of A. H. Wood.

Arad Hazzleton Wood, or, as he was familiarly called, Arad Wood, passed away early in the present summer, at the age of nearly ninety, living out his vitality to its full limit, never having drawn upon it beyond its capacity to giv. Waiting for some one to notice this old pioneer in the cause of right, we came to the conclusion that the latter day Materialist, traveling on smooth roads, should remember Arad Wood, who cut and slashed right and left at the supernatural humbug of Christian superstition, since the early days of the present century, making it possible for younger men to liv outside of prison walls. Mr. Wood was born in Massachusetts, near the line of Rhode Island, about the year 1800. At the age of nine years he was let out as a wage-slave to a farmer and mill-owner, working in fair weather on the farm, in rainy in the mill. After a period he went to Boston and learnt the carpenter trade. In 1834 he started a weekly paper called the Reformer and Anti-Monopolist. It did not liv many years, but it left a mark on the road to freedom. This was about the time of Andrew Jackson vetoing the charter of the National Bank. Had Andrew Jackson come to Boston at that time he would hav been shot. This made Arad Wood a "Jackson man." This was at the time of burning the Catholic nunnery and school at Charleston by the Protestants, when four hundred women and children were driven out of their home in the dead of night. This did not make Arad Wood a Catholic, but it made him love the weak and hate the strong. Father Ballou was at this time preachlng the doctrin of universal salvation at Cambridge. The idea held out by Hosea Ballou of no hell charmed Arad Wood, and he was a Universalist.

In the autumn of this year William Lloyd Garrison was mobbed by a crowd of ten thousand Boston merchants, clergymen, and lawyers, who dragged him through Washington street, howling "Hang him!" A rope was around his neck for that purpose. This made Mr. Wood a pronounced Abolitionist. At that period the Montgomery Guards, a military company composed of Irishmen, were stoned and hooted off of Boston Common and their charter annulled by the state legislature then in session. Then Arad Wood indorsed on his crest: My country is the world, my countrymen all mankind.

At this period Abner Kneeland was incarcerated in Cambridge jail for not believing in the God of the Universalist, and ever after Arad Wood spelt his god with two o's in it, and did reverence to nature and nature's laws, loving the world he saw and knew, well knowing he knew as much of other worlds as anyone (I am using Mr. Wood's own expressions).

I hav pictured the scenes of Arad Wood's early life—why he was a reformer; why his sympathies were with the distressed. Later Ezra Heywood was sent to Dedham jail—not for crime, but simply because he did not spell his words as other people did. Mr. Wood sought out Mr. Heywood and was ever after his steadfast friend.

Arad Wood was a Materialist. He hated the term Agnostic. To him it was shirking a fact. He knew twelve inches was a foot, sixteen ounces a pound, two pints a quart; that matter was eternal; that it embraced himself; that the vapors of this matter would ascend, again appearing in the rains, producing new vegetation, which in its turn produced new animal life.

Arad Wood moved from Boston to central Massachusets and spent the balance of his life as a farmer—to him a congenial occupation—surrounded by his family, consisting of four children, all worthy citizens, in the beautiful and rural little town of Lunenburg, a purely agricultural place on the hills of Worcester county, Mass. The grave was but a bed to him, and death his waiting wing.

GEO M. DAVENPORT.

Eminent Women.

LUCRETIA MOTT.—CONCLUDED.

When, as an enthusiastic Abolitionist, Lucretia Mott crossed the ocean to take part in the World's Antislavery Convention, the last drop in her cup of sorrow was the humiliation she was called on to suffer on account of sex. The vote by which this injustice was perpetrated, was due to the overwhelming majority of the clergy, who, with Bible in hand, swept all before them. No man can fathom the depths of rebellion in woman's soul when insult is heaped upon her sex, and this is intensified when done under the hypocritical assumption of divine authority. This fresh baptism into woman's degradation impelled the current of her thoughts into a new channel, and returning home, she, with a few friends, as rebellious as herself, called the first woman's rights convention. To this cause she brought a zeal unknown before, as here she could see the wrongs from a purely subjectiv point of view.

"While in London a rich young Quaker of bigoted tendencies, who made several breakfast and tea parties for the American delegates, always omitted to invite Mrs. Mott. He very politely said to her, on one occasion when he was inviting others in her presence, 'Thou must excuse me, Lucretia, for not inviting thee with the rest, but I fear thy influence on my children'!!"

Mrs Fry always shunned Lucretia, and was afraid of her dangerous (!) truths. The Quakers in England were afraid of her, and called her "an Infidel, a heretic, a disturber, who had destroyed the peace in the Friends' Society in Pennsylvania, and thrown a firebrand into the World's Convention," and who in a recent speech in London had quoted sentiments from Mary Wollstonecroft and Thomas Paine.

These, then terrible things, would now raise hardly a ripple of opposition among any class of thinkers and reformers, but they were judgments bringing a cruel ostracism and bitter contumely in their wake.

"Many anecdotes are told of Mrs. Mott's rigid economy, such as sewing the smallest rags to be woven into carpets, and writing letters on infinitesimal bits of paper; but it must not be inferred from this peculiarity that she was penurious, as she was generous in her charities and in her support of every good cause. . . . Alfred Love, president of the Peace Society, who frequently received letters from Mrs. Mott, says, "The one before me is two and a half inches wide by two and a quarter inches long, written on both sides, and contains 141 words, and treats of seven distinct matters, and disposes of them in good order, apologizing for her apparent economy of paper and inclosing a contribution of $5 for a benevolent object." "At one time," says Mrs. Stanton, "when excitement on the divorce question ran high in New York, and there was a great hue and cry about free love on our platform, I was invited to speak before the legislature on the bill then pending, asking 'divorce for drunkenness.' . . . Mrs. Mott charged Ernestine L. Rose and myself not to take too radical ground, in view of the hostility to the bill, but to keep closely to the merits of the main question. I told her she might feel sure of me, as I had my speech written and I would read it to her, which I did and received her approval. The time arrived for the hearing and a magnificent audience greeted us at the capital. The bill was read. I made the opening speech and Mrs. Rose followed. We had asked for the modification of certain statutes and the passage of others, making the laws more equal for man and woman.

"Mrs. Mott having listened attentivly to all that was said, and coming to the conclusion that with eighteen causes for divorce in the different states, there might as well be no laws at all on the question, she arose and said 'she had not thought profoundly on the subject, but it seemed to her no laws whatever on this relation would be better than such as bound pure, innocent women in bondage to dissipated, unprincipled men. With such various laws in the different states, would it not be better to place all the states on the same basis and thus make our national laws homogeneous? She was surprised on returning to the residence of Lydia Mott, to hear that her speech was altogether the most radical of the lot.

"The bold statement of 'no laws' was, however, so sugar coated with eulogies on good men, and the sacredness of the marriage relation, that the press complimented the moderation of Mrs. Mott at our expense. . . . At another convention Mrs. Mott and I were sitting close together, with our heads bowed and eyes closed, listening to the invocation. As the chaplain proceeded, he touched the garden scene in paradise, and spoke of woman as a secondary creation, called into being for the especial benefit of man, an afterthought of the creator. Straightening up, Mrs. Moot whispered to me, 'I cannot bow my head to such absurdities.' Edward M. Davis, in the audience, noticed his mother's movements, knowing what had struck his mind had disturbed hers also, left the hall, returned, Bible in hand, ascended the platform, and as the chaplain said amen, he (Davis) read from the opening chapter of Genesis the account of the simultaneous creation of man and woman, in which dominion was given to both alike over every living thing. After Mr. Davis made a few pertinent remarks on the allegorical character of the second chapter of Genesis, Mrs. Mott followed with a critical analysis of the prayer, and the portion of scripture read by her son, showing the eternal oneness and equality of man and woman, the union of the masculin and feminin elements, like to positiv and negativ magnetism, the centripetal and centrifugal forces in nature pervading the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, the whole world of thought and action."

Thus did Mrs. Mott turn the tables on the Bible-croakers, and prove her position by this conglomerate volume that is "all things to all men."

In speaking of theological beliefs to a priest, she said they are "a system of speculations about the unseen and the unknowable, which the human mind has no power to grasp, or explain, and these speculations vary with every sect, age, and type of civilization. No one knows any more of what lies beyond our sphere of action than thou or I, and we know nothing."

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Some Thoughts on Spiritualism.

For many years I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and an occasional contributor to its columns, but I don't think I hav ever yet touched upon the subject of Spiritualism, although many times tempted to do so. I know of no publication, which rejects the Spiritual theory, more just or fair to its opponents than THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am now prompted to say something on this subject by reason of the remarks made by F. E. Ormsby in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 9th.

He says: "I hav proved to myself the existence of a life beyond the grave—the immortality of the intelligence, will power, consciousness, or mind of human individualities. It is not a matter of belief. There is no such thing as belief in my idea of continued life; a man must know the fact, must hav positiv proof." I hav heard just such talk as this before. Bible believers indulge in it. They will say: "I know that my redeemer liveth. I realize his presence every hour of my waking existence. I go to him with my troubles and he speaks comfort to my soul. He answers my prayers, and he tells me the Bible is true." To a rational mind this is of no more force than as though a parrot had given it utterance. I am willing to admit that all truth is not known, and that some individuals can grasp and know more of truth than others. But I affirm that all truth, having natural laws for its base, is demonstrable. So then, if it be true that man has a life beyond the grave, and that truth has been discovered by any man or woman, that same truth is discoverable by all other men or women of equal capacity, and is susceptible of being demonstrated as true, like other truths based on natural law.

I hav much charity for a Spiritualist because I know he reasons logically as far as he has knowledge; and, as a rule, I must giv him credit for more reason and logic than sometimes characterizes his opponent. Our ancestors reasoned logically when they denied that people lived on the opposit side of the globe; nevertheless they were mistaken. If I knew nothing of the principles of gas, and supposed air to be the lightest substance known, and a man should tell me that he saw a man rise in the air tied to a great bladder as big as a house, I should probably deny his statement and tell him that it was impossible. But when I came to see the same thing myself I would be obliged to modify my statement, but I could still claim that the principle which governed this phenomenon was discoverable and demonstrable, and when discovered and demonstrated we would all exclaim, "Why, of course, the bladder or the balloon had to ascend. It would hav been a miracle if it did not."

I hav never denied the facts of Spiritualism since I became convinced of their truth, more than thirty-five years ago. I say "facts of Spiritualism," without meaning to admit that these facts prove a life beyond this life. I once believed they did, but now I know they do not. I hav witnessed, I think, nearly all the phases of modern Spiritualism, from the rappings of the Fox sisters to the slate-writing of Slade, and the materializations of Harvey Mott and other mediums. I stand upon the solid ground of admitting all the phenomena usually ascribed to the agency of disembodied spirits, but denying that in it all there is any proof of a life out of the body. An enthusiastic Spiritualist says to me: "Why, I saw my mother, who has been dead several years. She came to me just as real as you stand there now, and she told me of things which had happened before and since her death, and of which I know the medium knew nothing." A thousand testimonies of this kind can be furnished, and it is useless to deny them. It is useless to deny that rappings are heard, that forms appear, that writings are mysteriously produced, and that a palpable, powerful, and tangible physical force is brought to bear in conjunction with these phenomena. With the average individual, the moment he concedes these wonders the same moment he accepts the doctrin that they are the work of spirits, because there is an intelligence behind them like unto our own. It is precisely in this manner that men prove there is a God who made everything, and that he had a purpose or a design in everything that he made. This arises from the fact that our first knowledge or impressions come from our immediate surroundings, and pertain more especially to the artificial world. We see a chair or stool. It was made by man for a purpose. We sleep in a bed. We hav clothes made for us. In short, the growth of our early mind is so intimately associated with things made by older people, and made for a purpose, that in a larger sense, when we first begin to take cognizance of trees, of the wardrobe of nature, of the sun, moon, and stars, to hear thunder and see lightning, we immediately associate these things with a higher or greater power than man, and thus our God is born. The more developed mind, however, can see no wisdom or plan in creation. As God is born of our ignorance, and given power, and even shape, by our rude imaginations, so in like manner are spirits born and clothed with certain powers and attributes, but when the test of science is applied God fails and so do the spirits fail. A man may safely bet that he can get as many answers to his prayers from a stone image as anybody can get from a "living God." But whoever puts his trust in a stone image, expecting that image to do him some favor by the exercise of an intelligent faculty, is on a plane with the lowest heathen, but he is no lower than any other individual who puts his trust in a "living God," and who expects that God to do for him that which the stone image failed to do for his neighbor. So far as science or results are concerned, there is no practical difference between a stone image and a "living God." One is as deaf and insensible as the other. And precisely so with spirits. Since the dawn of modern Spiritualism every test that would go to prove the actual presence of an intelligence different from or above or beyond the intelligence of mortals, has failed. We get only that which we know, or which has its counterpart in the human mind somewhere on this mundane ball. Ask the spirits what was the fate of Charley Ross and we get no truthful answer, but bring us somebody who knows and we then may get some truthful answers. Ask a spirit to tell us something about the "spheres" in the other world, and we will hav them accurately described according to our best imaginations, but ask him to explore the Polar sea and make for us a chart by which the long-looked-for passage may be found, and our answer will be as from a stone image.

There hav probably been hundreds, if not thousands, of specific tests arranged between individuals in life to be consummated after the death of one of the parties, all of which hav failed. If the claims of Spiritualism were true these could be demonstrated. If Mr. Ormsby shall liv after his death, and shall hav power to appear, speak, rap, or communicate with friends left behind, let him while living bury a box with some written instructions, and carry the secret of the hiding to the other world, and from there communicate the matter written, and the place of the hiding. A few well-authenticated instances like this would scientifically establish the claims of Spiritualism, but nothing like it was ever known to occur, although time and again hav such tests been arranged.

But, I can imagin I will be asked how I can account for the phenomena which I know to occur. My answer is that I can't account for it, no more than I can account for the origin of life. But since I know that life exists, and exists only in accord with certain laws, because I don't know its origin I am not bound to believe or to accept any speculations or conjectures touching its origin or its ending; more especially when such speculations or conjectures refute certain well known laws or principles which come under the general law of scientific demonstration. For instance, I am told by Spiritualists that I will never die, that it is only my body which will die, but that I will continue to liv, capable of enjoying life as heretofore. There can be enjoyment of life without memory, and this implies that after my body is dead I will remember my father and my mother, the places in which I hav lived; in short, the events of my life as I shall happen to remember them at or preceding the death of my body. Life is enjoyable only when the mind is receiving new impressions coupled with the memory of them. I know a man now past ninety years of age whose mind and memory hav been gradually failing for the past ten or twelve years. Science demonstrates that the failure is due to a weakening or softening of the brain. He is past all enjoyment of this life. Can he ever enjoy life again? Certainly not, in the sense in which we understand this matter. If the spiritual theory is true, then for this man to enjoy life his memory must be restored, and it becomes an interesting question to fix a date from which it should be restored. It would be no pleasure for him to remember himself as a helpless imbecil, refusing the kind offices of his nearest friends. In fact, that which we know to be inexorable law is at variance with every theory of continued conscious existence, and so far, although there are many remarkable occurrences which pass for manifestations of the living dead, yet, so far as yet heard from, there is not a manifestation which can be demonstrated as caused by an individual whose body lies moldering in the grave and who once lived, breathed, and was known among men.

In a future communication, if permitted, I will relate some of my experiences with the spirits, together with some speculations or conjectures as to the source of the mysteries. JAMES K. MAGIE.

After-Thoughts.

DEDICATED TO MY MOTHER.

In the depth of the dim wood, far away from the busy haunts of men, in some sweet solitude peaceful as that life's rest, would I lay down the ashes of the loved. With my own hands would I fashion her last couch. Unannoyed by the obtrusivness of strangers, unaided save by the loving and lamenting, I would perform the last office of respect, I would pay the last tribute of affection to that form which soon must mingle with the dust. And there would my grief seek comfort communing in silence and tranquillity, sure that no unhallowed tread should profane that hallowed earth; that no unmoistened eye should laugh to scorn my heart's fidelity—

That no rude hand should tear the flowers
From off that purest breast,
Or disturb the calm and peaceful sleep
Of thy eternal rest.

Hark! the tramp of hirelings resounds upon the floor. They enter the house of mourning, and with ruthless hands they bear the outworn to the couch of rest. Oh, why do not the hands that smoothed the pillow of sickness perform this sacred duty? Why should the utterance of the most solemn parting be the bought and formal words of cold hearted and careless strangers? If the awed silence of grief must be broken when the earth receives back her own, who should speak the words of consolation but those whose affections hav been already ministrant? Who should say the last farewell but the one most wishful for the traveler's welfare? What preventeth this? It is the world's religion. It is the world's command that human passions and human thoughts shall bow down before accustomed forms. Dearest mother, what hav forms and ceremonies, arbitrarily established, to be bought and sold, forced and counterfeited, to do with thee? Alas, that the services from humanity to humanity, which should be rendered freely and lovingly, should be in the keeping of a den of thieves, only to be bought when spoiled and worthless. There is no feeling in a hired and prescribed service. The pompous hearse and feathers, the prating of unconcerned and white-robed officials, the crowding together of sorrow and curiosity, the indecent and business-like lowering of the casket, the tramping o'er the dead to disentangle ropes, the harsh grating of the workmen's spades as they shovel the earth upon that once loved form, the after refreshments at the hostelry—these are the world's religious forms, or, rather, insults cast at humanity, at the poetry of the human heart. The law-ordained mummery is over. Priests and drivers are laughing over the wages they hav earned. The grass is growing over the grave, and though thou art confined within thy narrow sphere, do'st think the living will forget thee? Nay, were thou far away in the forest haunts, far away in some secluded spot, away from those monuments of ostentation and hypocrisy which make burial-grounds like mason's show-rooms, I could not forget thee. And there shall be one among them whose record lieth not. It needs no epitaph. Enough that the once-loved form is laid there to rest.

There is no need of marble monument exquisitly and elaborately sculptured, for living thoughts are drooping o'er that grave. The little children carelessly sporting among the tombs, gay as the flowers upon the green hills, seem they with their light-heartedness to profane my worship? Stay, doth the flower-bearing and buoyant spring insult the bygone winter? Do not the flowers bloom amid the dead leaves of last autumn's scattering? See, the children hav approached the grave; their merriment is hushed for a moment. Wondering in the simplicity of inexperienced childhood they pay the last homage of pity. O thou strict religionist, which is the better form, the pious earnestness of the paid priest, or the promis of the little child that she will tend the flowers upon the grave and prevent her playmates from injuring them? Priest and devotee, be silent, for here is a better creed than you hav ever taught or learned. Dry thine eyes, dear child; resume thy truthful laugh. 'Tis not the carelessness of the little one, but the forced solemnity of the unpitying stranger, that is offensiv. Death, what is it?

'Tis but the shadow of the shade,
Yet man to face it is afraid.

Afraid of what? Of death? Yes, man recoils before an empty word. Yet there is nothing in it that should pale the cheek or fill the timid with fear. Death is but the penalty of life. For to all who hav life death must come. It comes in the evening of life, when the brain is weary and outworn; it comes as an anodyne to soothe the throbbing brow. Pain and care giv place to rest and peace, and when the last sad moment has come it brings to the traveler a perfect tranquiliity of mind. But—

Come when thou wilt, cold anodyne,
I fear thee not.
Let all these hopes and dreams of mine
Be lost, forgot.

Life has been too unkind to me
These long, long years;
I giv her broken toys to thee,
Her bitter tears.

Quench but these tears, and still this heart,
What matter then?
Is it so hard a thing to part
With light and men?

Life bound me hand and foot a slave,
Her fetters rust.
Better the freedom of the grave—
Mix dust with dust.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

The Church and Reforms.

Rev. Carlos Martyn, D.D., in the Arena.

Run over the catalog of recent and current reforms. Take the antislavery cause. The essential blasphemy of slavery lay in this, that it broke into and desecrated the temple of the Holy Ghost, by dehumanizing a man into a chattel. It dealt in men and women as a drover trades in cattle. It changed marriage into prostitution, and made every plantation a nest of brothels. It herded negroes together as swine herd. It sold their offspring as hogs are sold. John Wesley, after living two years in the midst of slavery in Georgia, shook the dust from his feet against it and sailed from Savannah to England, crying out as he left, "Slavery is the sum of all villainies." The truest, tersest half dozen words ever tabled against it. Well he knew that language had no word that could fitly name such a system. So, in despair of naming it, he could only define it.

It is hardly credible to-day that such a hell uncapped should hav been so recently recognized as a part of American life—the dominant element. Business, quickened by the impulse which came from the gigantic traffic in cotton, stifled conscience in order to make money. Society, borrowing its tone from wealth, spread its screen over human bondage. Law soon found or made precedents and sanctions, for did not a fat retainer jingle in its palm? The church, of course, denounced it, did it not? Nay; with one or two small but honorable exceptions, the various denominations were the foremost apologists for, and often the thick and thin defenders of, man-stealing. The churchianity of the United States was three thousand years behind the Judaism of Moses, which denounced man-stealing. Individual pulpits were found refusing to bow the knee to American Baal. But as organized bodies, the denominations condoned the sin—when they did not defend it. In the same breath, they branded the Abolitionists as fanatics, meddling with what did not concern them, and anathematized them as Infidels assaulting the order of providence. Impious parsons hid the devil behind the Bible, and asked: "Did not Abraham own slaves? and did not Paul return the runaway Onesimus?" It is shameful, but it is the fact, that only yesterday in the great republic, the Declaration of Independence was treason, and the Golden Rule was heresy.

Take temperance. Every race has its passional tendency, its characteristic vice. Intemperance is ours. Drunkenness is in the Anglo-Saxon blood. As we first appear in history, Tacitus paints us as gluttons and drunkards. In the old German forests our forefathers' idea of heaven was a drunken revel.

Now, science invents and fetches to such a blood a cheap stimulus—alcohol; so cheap that a workingman can earn enough in a day to keep him drunk for a week. Ninety per cent of the crime, say the lawyers, an equally excessiv proportion of the taxation, say the statesmen, are the spawn of rum. Homes are broken up, lives are wrecked, perdition is populated by this vice. For half a century, a temperance crusade has been carried on to redeem the holy land of man's body and soul desecrated by the worse than Turkish tyranny of the brandy bottle and the whisky keg. Facts hav been collected, parties hav been rallied, legislatures hav been besieged, great states hav been put on the witness-stand. But where has the church been? Isolated pulpits hav stood embattled among the crusaders. But the prominent pulpits, the fashionable pulpits, the wealthy pulpits, are so intently watching the pews that they cannot see the drunkard. Or if jogged and forced to look at him, they advise him to be more moderate—forgetful of Dr. Johnson's confession: "I can abstain; I can't be moderate." And they hav obstructed and continue to obstruct temperance by flaunting the example of Jesus as an argument against it. To individual clergymen temperance owes much. But to churchianity it owes nothing.

Take the effort to broaden the sphere of women. Forty years ago woman in the land of Jefferson was shut up in eastern seclusion. If she belonged to the wealthier class, she was imprisoned in a gilded cage, like a pet canary. She was regarded as a piece of animated bric-a-brac. She had privileges but not rights. She was given compliments instead of justice. If she belonged to the poorer class, she was the drudge of the household. Whether rich or poor she was held to be guilty of her sex. As wife, she was merged in her husband. As mother, she had no claim upon her own offspring. As daughter, she was dwarfed by her brothers. As woman, she was ranked with "children and idiots." Her sex excluded her from every bread-winning avocation save teaching and the needle. As all female bread-winners were crowded into these two callings, they were so overcrowded that a woman thrown on her own exertions had to choose between starvation and a life of shame.

All this has been changed. The statute books of forty states hav been remodeled. The sphere of woman has been broadened to include everything God made her able to do—is almost coextensiv with man's. Even the colleges hav conceded to the sisters of Madame de Staël and Charlotte Bronté, of Maria Mitchell and Mrs. Browning, brains enough to study Greek and Latin in annexes.

Meanwhile, churchianity has been the resolute opposer of every single step forward. It has flung Paul in the face of woman, precisely as it threw Onesimus in the face of the slave and the example of Jesus in the face of temperance. Here again individual clergymen only make the exception that proves the rule.

Take the labor movement—the movement of the masses against the classes, in Gladstone's phrase—the movement of the toilers to rescue from the clutches of work and wealth, shorter hours, and a share in the profits. This movement, the world over, is the latest and largest of miracles. From Russia to the United States, labor is marshaling its forces to day for the purpose of controling to-morrow.

Straws show which way the wind is blowing. One of these tell-tale straws is the popular outcry against trusts, monopolies, and the protean shapes assumed by illusiv and aggressiv capital. Another, is the multiplication of labor organizations, and the rapid gravitation of these toward federation. Another, is the sale within a few months of two hundred and fifty thousand copies of Edward Bellamy's industrial romance—a book which owes its phenomenal success to no special charm of style, still less to any novelty of suggestion, but only to the universal interest in the industrial question.

Churchianity takes no interest in it, never discusses it, knows nothing about it. The preachers are too busy bombarding the Pharisees of old to train their guns on the Pharisees of the nineteenth century. They only say: "Bless us! what a noise those fellows in their shirt-sleeves are making out there. Let us sing the Doxology."

Henry of Navarre wrote to his friend Chillon: "We hav conquered at Argues, et tu n'y étais pas" (You were not there, my Chillon). So the reformers may say to churchianity, "You were not with us." Or if churchianity was on the battlefield, it has always been in the ranks of the enemy.

The slave cried: "Church of the living God, help me to liberty!" And churchianity replied: "Be quiet. You are black. Stay where you are, for we are trying to send the free colored people back to Africa." Temperance cries: "Christians, aid us to medicate this cancer of drunkenness which is eating out the vitals of civilization." And churchianity responds: "Did not Paul advise Timothy to take a little wine for his stomach's sake?" Woman cries: "I am trembling between starvation and the brothel. Open to me broader avenues of occupation." And churchianity answers, "Fie! For shame! Do you want to unsex yourself? Go home and darn stockings and rock a cradle." Labor cries: "Giv me a chance. I want shorter hours, better wages, more bread on the table, and part ownership in what I make." And Christianity whispers: "Sh! Capital rents the pews, pays for the music, and patronizes the parson. We'll open a soup-house. We'll build a mission chapel on a side street and name it 'St. Lazarus.'"

IN an opening speech at the annual meeting of the American Baptist Missionary Union, in Chicago, the president of the Union, George W. Northrup, D.D., LL.D., who is also president of the Morgan Park Theological Seminary, made these statements regarding the failure of Christianity in the world. "There are to-day one billion heathen, while at the beginning of the Christian era there were only six hundred millions—an actual increase of four hundred millions after the lapse of eighteen centuries. Again, during the era of modern missions—the last one hundred years—the heathen population has increased two hundred millions, while the number converted to Christianity from the whole heathen world is estimated at three millions. Another fact is that there are three hundred million nominal Christians belonging to organizations thoroughly corrupt and worldly, Christians only in name: while, of the one hundred million Protestant Christians, the great mass are, as we hav said, worldly, apathetic, sleeping as if drugged by some fatal opiate."

THE book department of this office is very busily engaged just now in mailing the hundreds of our Pictorial Text-Book which hav been bought in advance. The books hav to be sent to the post-office by wagon-loads.

The delay in issuing has been due to the usual procrastination of printers, who break presses and hav other troubles at just the wrong times. The foreman of the press-room reports also that he had to watch these books with unusual care, lest the employees of his place—all Christians, by the way—should carry them off. Their motiv in this, he said, was to plague other good Christians by showing the pictures and asking them what they had to say about it anyway.

On the last page of this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be found an advertisment of the book which givs a good idea of its contents and arrangement; and shows, too, something of the large amount of labor necessary to its preparation. We think that a perusal of the advertisment will convince anyone that the work will fulfill its purpose, and is cheap at two dollars. Having arrived at this conclusion, we trust each reader who has not already done so will forward his order.

The Phenomena of Conversion.

As a philosophical analysis of the phenomenon of Christian conversion, the being "born again," as the Methodists and other religious sentimentalists phrase it, we can recommend Samuel P. Putnam's new book, "My Religious Experience." Mr. Putnam has been through the fire, or through that period of existence when the heart dominates the brain, and unreasoning sentiment takes complete possession of the mind, holding it captiv to the feelings given by heredity, custom, environment. He can point to the precise moment when this occurred, when from an unreasoning unbeliever he was changed into a still more unreasoning believer. In the twinkling of an eye, every one of his doubts was removed, overwhelming joy followed, and he "rose triumphant" over every evil by which he was surrounded. It took him twenty years to get out of this hole, with incidental backslidings, and to land at last upon the solid ground of science.

Mr. Putnam is the son of a minister, but he took little stock in Christianity in his early days. By nature a poet, Shelley early led him into the path toward sentimental Atheism. In this mood he enlisted in the army, and held what he thought were his convictions until he caught the camp-fever. Camp-fever, he says, is nothing in particular, but bad all around. Like sea-sickness, it makes the victim wish it were fatal. Suffering from this, he was about to giv up the duties of a soldier and go to the hospital, when word reached his corps that Stonewall Jackson was after them. If this news had had the effect upon all the army that it did upon Mr. Putnam, the church ought to hav engaged Stonewall as a revivalist. The victim of camp-fever had to shoulder his musket and start toward Washington, and it was upon this march that Jesus appeared to him as did the vision to Saul of Tarsus. He wandered back to childhood and infancy as through a living world. Home came before him with its sweet scenes, and mingled with the pictures the teachings he had received from father and mother—the milder aspect of religion, not the wrath of God or the fires of hell, but the love of Jesus. Vividly appeared the cross and the illustrious sufferer upon it. With overwhelming power sounded the appeal he had so often heard, "Surrender to Jesus." He was looking at the cross shining against an ineffable halo. There was no fear in his emotions. It was simply attraction. It was the tenderness of Christ that charmed him, the glorious sacrifice, the divinity coming to earth and dying to save. "Simply to thy cross I cling," was the unspoken song of his heart. He beheld no flames of vengeance, only the exquisitly beautiful vision of a lovely and noble being ready to help. Suddenly out of his weakness, his suffering, the pain, the weariness, and the despair, his heart cried out, "I surrender!" There was no reserve. It was like taking the hand of a friend and going with him, not because he feared him, but because he loved him. An indescribable sweetness and delight at once took possession of his being. He was in a new world apparently. He was exultant, victorious. As if by magic, every pain went away. He was no longer burdened, no longer weary. His step was light. He was supremely happy, as if a crown had been placed upon his head.

Thus in his exquisit way he tells of the sentimental change resulting from camp-fever and the proximity of Stonewall Jackson. He remained many months in the army, was promoted to captain, and at the close of the war resigned his commission and went into the minister business. In this he drifted about from Massachusetts to Nebraska, his brain gradually resuming its sway, until the crisis came at Omaha where he was settled over a Unitarian church. He had invited a Materialist lecturer, Mr. B. F. Underwood, to deliver one of his lectures in his pulpit. The discourse was scientific and Materialistic, unclothed in any rhetorical garb, and its bare statements shocked Mr. Putnam's people. Our preacher, however, agreed fully with the lecture, and it occurred to him that in filling a Unitarian pulpit he was occupying a false position. The strongest part of Mr. Putnam's nature is a hearty honesty and sincerity of conviction, and as might be expected, his resignation, when he found that he was no longer a Christian, was promptly given to his congregation. But absolute freedom had not yet come; he was an optimist, and his nature could not accept cold Materialism and bare facts. He was "in the cloudlands, and the gorgeous colors of imagination did not allow him to see things as they are." Tossed upon a sea of uncertainty, under the impulse of feeling, he crawled back into the Unitarian fold, and located at Northfield, Mass., the home of Moody the revivalist. But, studying Moody's sermons, he found that Christianity was dead to him. Orthodoxy became unendurable; it was a prison-house, gloomy and terrible.

While at Northfield, he seems to hav really awakened for the first time since the camp-fever and Stonewall Jackson converted him. "Looking over the vast spaces I had traversed," he says, "I wondered. It seemed as if I could go no further away, that I had reached the ultima thule of intellectual wandering, and was safe at last in a realm of thought the most beautiful and entrancing possible. Yet I was destined to a change more deep and awful. The dream world was shattered, and I was carried onward amidst the storms of thought farther from my beautiful faith than that faith itself was from the shadows of orthodoxy." This change from a conglomeration of optimism, transcendentalism, theosophy, and pantheism, which satisfied for the time his poetic yearnings, and which he sought to cherish, was a change to Atheism. "The utter falseness of the philosophy of feeling was burnt in upon my soul with agonies unutterable." The question he was obliged to meet was the existence of God. "If there is really a God, man must be a machine. So far as there is a particle of liberty there is no God. Every advance of freedom is the destruction of deity. God, by the definition, is infinit. If existing, he is an infinit despot, all-in-all. One ray of liberty, therefore, dethrones him, for if the despotism ceases to be infinit, so does the deity who makes it, and cannot, therefore, be God; that is, the infinit. In this sense, therefore, there is an eternal conflict between God and man—between deity and rights. God by his very nature is the foe of human rights. Whatever form he may take; however gentle and beautiful; however lovable; whether as a personality or no personality; whether as a conscious being or not; whether outside of the universe or inside of it as a pervading soul, whatever aspect the God idea takes it is the subtle and enormous foe of liberty. If God is not a fact but simply an idea, that idea being formulated out of the sentiments, and not by reason—sentiments which, however good and sweet themselvs, are blind and imperious—that idea becomes equally tyrannical with the supposed fact, and therefore it is as necessary to the liberty of man to abolish the belief in God as it would be to abolish God, if it were granted that such a being was in existence. This was the terrific and, for the time being, bewildering question that was thrust upon me. It was no longer of the intellect and heart, but of the moral nature and conscience. It was a question between liberty and slavery. To vindicate liberty I must dethrone God. I must dethrone the idea, however reverenced and entrancing. I must dethrone the sentiments as arbiters of truth, and stand simply and solely by the intellect. I found the sentiments to be the most cruel of masters—cruel as the Inquisition itself, blind and terrible, unreasoning and irresponsible."

The dream fabric of transcendentalism was swept away, and he felt thankful for the catastrophe. The skies were swept clear of gods and divinities. The stars rolled on, but they no longer told of deity. The sun no longer blazoned a supernal glory. It was simple earth and man that he was to deal with thereafter. And as there is more of earth and man to the square inch in New York than anywhere else, he came to this city—the "epitome of the world," where there is "virtue, lofty and shining, and crime lurid, yet flashing in its tempestuous fires with a Lucifer-like effulgence." Amidst these rushing streams and furious oppositions, mingled with all that art and poetry and philosophy can giv of beauty, of delight, of wisdom, Stonewall Jackson's convert sought to build up a new faith that might take the place of the old. How well he succeeded, aided by Ingersoll, Andrews, Wakeman, and the Liberal Club, the fascinating record of his religious experiences bears evidence. He proposes to die, when the time unhappily comes, an Infidel.

And now, what is "conversion"—the cataclysmal topsy-turvy which people turn under the influence of emotion? Mr. Putnam's new birth was as sudden as Paul's, as genuin as Bunyan's or any other saint's. There was "the same surrender, the same wonderful ecstasy, the same transformation of purpose, the same change of character." It was a fact; he was "converted" as radically as any human being was ever converted. Like Mary Alacoque, who in her cataleptic attacks had visions of bleeding saints, Putnam saw a picture of Jesus upon the cross, "loving me and dying for me." Again, like this church saint, when, recovering from an attack of paralysis, she renounced her family and "became absolutely passiv to the will of God," Mr. Putnam surrendered to Jesus and felt for him a passionate adoration, abandoning himself without any thought of reward "to a being whose loveliness compelled from him all thought of his own personal welfare." Mary Alacoque was deemed by the abbess of Paray, to whom she dedicated some erotic verses about the love of Jesus, to be insane, and undoubtedly she was. The Christian theologian, however, ascribes such changes and abandonment to an ideal, directly to the spirit of God. It is called a "miracle of grace," an exhibition of supernatural power produced by the influence of God on the soul; a spiritual motion; a putting of God's spirit into us. Mr. Putnam, however, appealing from Philip drunk to Philip sober, agrees more nearly with the abbess of Paray than with the theologians. Conversion, he says, is the direct offspring of unhappiness. The experience is a rebound from human misery. If one were perfectly happy and all his environments agreeable, there would be no "new birth." The success of revivals is in proportion to business depression and misfortunes in the community. The Holy Spirit prevails along with earthquakes, floods, and epidemics. One is very seldom "converted" unless, metaphorically speaking, he is "flat on his back." When one is upright and prosperous he takes very little stock in regeneration. When he is sick and on his death-bed, or is poor and out of work, and this world presents a gloomy aspect, it is then one begins to think of another and a brighter world. Being stranded in time, he begins to bank on eternity. When the pockets are empty here the golden harp has a great attraction. When there is no food for the hungry stomach the wine and grapes of the New Jerusalem make an alluring display. When the back aches, and the heart aches, "heavenly rest" is seductiv. The origin of the Christian religion, and of all religions, is the misery of man. Man is a religious animal because he is an unhappy animal. The universality of religion is based upon the universality of suffering. Take away suffering, and religion would cease to be. The first priest was a medicin man, and every priest to-day is a medicin man. He flourishes on the ills of humanity. He is for the sick-bed, and not for the mart or the bright, green fields where happiness reigns. Destroy all disease, and every church would go by the board.

Mr. Putnam claims, also, that not only is conversion the result of unfortunate surroundings, but is an abnormal state of the physical being. It is an exhibition of disease itself. There is something wrong with the natural body when the "new birth" occurs. I believe, he says, that clairvoyance, mediumship, second sight, and spiritual ecstasies of every kind are the result of ill health. Conversions belong to this class of phenomena. They are a mental fever, a kind of insanity. They cannot last. It is impossible for a human being to remain a great while in a state of "conversion." This shows that it is the result of extraordinary conditions of the body. Bad livers are a fruitful source of conversions. Indigestion is frequently on the "side of the Lord." Pain is productiv of piety. Almost every saint is on the sick-list, and Zion is the home of invalids.

Mr. Putnam places the "camp-fever" among the antecedents of his "change of heart." Not the less real was the change; not the less real was the faith that resulted from it.

Again, there are not only physiological reasons but psychological reasons as well. The influence of the supposed spirit of God is altogether subjectiv, says our recovered patient, and not objectiv. The peace, the serenity, come from an absolute submission. There is always a struggle before conversion, which is the end of the struggle. Naturally there comes a feeling of relief. The battle is over. There is nothing more to be done.

These physiological and psychological elements, says Mr. Putnam, explain all the phenomena of "conversion." In some cases it is no more than a bodily excitement created by abnormal physical conditions. In some cases it is no more than the exultation of escaping the miseries of this world by faith in the glories of the hereafter. In its higher forms of mental exhilaration it is simply that natural peace and serenity which comes from the cessation of struggle, and calm submission to an eternal fate, or in its very highest and most radiant splendor it is that sublime and delectable sentiment which results from the surrender of the whole mind, heart, and soul to the grandeur of ideal goodness.

This analysis is complete, and ought be satisfactory to our Christian friends. But there are other phenomena connected with the new birth which it does not touch. We should intensely enjoy a knowledge of why a converted colored Methodist is more dangerous to a henroost than other men and brethren, and why a Methodist preacher, full of the holy spirit, is more dangerous to the chastity of women than an unconverted mortal.

The Pope's Humbug Wail.

About three times a year the pilot fish of the papal shark sends out a proclamation that the pirate of the religious sea will swim out of Rome. This is the latest of such proclamations, given to the world through the Manchester, Eng., Courier:

"In consequence of the fierce persecution of the church, which is the policy of Crispi, the pope will soon issue a manifesto to the Roman Catholics throughout the world, giving his intention of leaving Rome, together with his court and all his adherents. From a practical point of view this means ruin to Rome, for with the pontiff will go the cardinals, the prelates, and a vast number of persons who annually come to Rome as pilgrims. In fact, commercial ruin stares innkeepers and shopkeepers in the face. Still, it is impossible for any earnest Christian even now to liv in Rome, which is fast becoming the headquarters of Atheism and Freethought. The shop windows are full of shocking caricatures of the deity, license is allowed for blasphemy, and its indecency has never been surpassed in history, even during the French year of 1793."

The proclamation is a humbug. The pope is not persecuted, he is only made to mind his own business, and he will not leave Rome. He could not be driven out with a club.

The idea in sending out such notices is to obtain sympathy from Catholic nations for the pope, and to enlist foreign interference in his behalf with the Italian government. The notices are as futil, however, as they are untruthful. The days of religious statehood are passed, and the world will not again see a sovereign pope making and unmaking kings and ruling the world from a papal throne.

Going too Far.

Since the enactment of laws that made books and papers unmailable because of their obscene, indecent, or immoral quality or "tendency," it has often happened that the postal department has, by the advice of its attorney-general, excluded or held back books or papers, passing upon them as being unmailable "under the law." So far the law has directly provided for the prosecution only of those persons who deposit in the mail printed matter that a jury can be found to declare unmailable, but perhaps by implication the law makes it possible for postal officials, if so advised by their official attorneys, to exclude prints without jury trial. This function has at all events been assumed by the department in Washington, and more than once even petty postmasters hav taken it upon themselvs to "follow master." It is not likely that this method of enforcing the laws has ever been thought of or intended; but it has eventuated, and practically constitutes postmasters censors of the press, so far as the privileges of the mails are concerned.

If a citizen be in doubt as to the mailability of a book he may submit it to the postal department for opinion, may get an opinion, favorable or adverse, but there is no provision of law entitling a citizen to such an official judgment, and if he can obtain a favorable decision upon any particular book he may nevertheless be prosecuted and convicted for mailing it, if a jury happen to differ in opinion from the official decision, and Judges Foster of Kansas, Carpenter of Boston, or Benedict of New York would probably not permit evidence as to the previous official decision to be put in on trial to influence the jury.

On the other hand, if the post-office officials rule against a book and on jury trial the mailer of it be acquitted, there is no provision of mail laws by which the publisher could compel the post-office official to accept and mail the book; though we presume he could resort to a civil suit for damages, or some expensiv mode of injunction to restrain the official person interfering with his citizen rights to use of mails.

It is therefore very evident that if there were an intention to establish a United States censorship of the press, it has been very imperfectly and unfairly done, and the whole matter needs careful consideration, and a revised action which shall enable a citizen to know his lawful rights and the officials to understand the limitations of their powers of interference and suppression.

These thoughts are revived—for they are old notions with us—by an occurrence which has waked up the newspaper press to the fact that a press censorship has insidiously grown like a fungus on the post-office department, and is being exercised there ad libitum.

The operations of this sort heretofore hav not appeared to be of sufficient importance to attract the notice and remarks of editors of the big dailies, but the ruling adverse to Tolstoi's "Kreutzer Sonata" has aroused them to talk of "dangerous precedents," "paternalism," "no power of national government to regulate morals of American homes," "governed too much," "too much of this meddling business," etc; and even an administration organ says distinctly that this censorship has not public approval, and is likely to lead to "sequences that the American people never would permit."

This official slop-over, this error of going too far in censorship, occurred opportunely to call forth public sentiment on this matter at a time when even greater restrictions by mail laws are ready for action in bills before Congress.

We are, of course, glad that official interference with the people's rights has at last brought forth a general outburst of indignant rebuke from the secular press, and a protest against this attempt at exercise of censorship power in the United States post-office.

Although this has called attention to the fact that though there is no provision in the United States Constitution for exercising any censorship of the press, nor any law really enacted for the purpose, it is nevertheless true that this function has been exercised, apparently under sanction of laws limiting the use of the mails, by officials who assume to hav the right to pass upon the moral quality of literature offered for mailing.

This assumption of authority is no new thing, as in matters of less public importance it has been employed for nearly fifteen years against individuals who had not the means to cope with the United States government as represented by officials usurping unconstitutional powers. These petty cases hav attracted no considerable attention, and created only indignation among a select few of those who hav valued and wished to guard and preserve the liberties of the press, as provided for in our Constitution; but this attempt to curtail the privileges of large numbers of the people by denying them the getting of a popular book by mail has inaugurated a revolt which may be of great service to the cause of free press and free mails.

It is necessary to state here as part of the history of this governmental assault on the "Kreutzer Sonata," that it is credibly reported from Washington that the postmaster-general denies responsibility for this action, and stands ready to reverse the decision of his subordinates if anyone will take the trouble to appeal for such favorable action in behalf of the book; but no one appeals, no one recognizes the ruling-out; even local postmasters ignore it, the fulminators of the "bull" are in general contempt, and this department of the government in an amusing dilemma.

If officialdom believed its decision would be echoed by a jury of twelve men in a United States court, there would no doubt be a prosecution of some one somewhere to vindicate the majesty of the government and the wisdom of its censors, but such a prosecution, in spite of no end of offenses, is not begun; and the moral is that these censors should be sure they are right before they go ahead; or better, let this questionable function alone, that they may be sure to commit no nuisance.

MR. A. B. CURTIS uses a column and a half of Unity to explain "why men do not believe the Bible to-day." He might hav cut his essay short by writing that men do not believe the Bible because they hav found that its statements are untrue.

THE New Hampshire Sentinel reports that all the ministers of Keene, with the exception of the Catholic priest and the Episcopal rector, hav left town on vacations, and says that the laity are commenting unfavorably upon the fact. This state of things is really too bad; but the laity now hav an excellent opportunity to see how easy they can get along without the dominies, and what utterly useless parasites the clergy are.

SOME one sends us a copy of the San Antonio, Tex., Express, containing a eulogy of a "Col. L. F. Copeland of Pennsylvania," an orator who "answers" Colonel Ingersoll, with the query on the margin, "Who is this Copeland?" We cannot answer the question. If he is so great as the Express correspondent asserts he would hav been heard from nearer the center of the country, and all would know him. Probably the eulogy was written by himself.

A PRESBYTERIAN preacher who writes for a syndicate of papers has sent this wail out in the country: "Is the United States a Christian nation? Probably nine hundred and ninety-nine intelligent persons out of every one thousand would answer this question in the affirmativ; and rightly, because a very large majority of the most intelligent inhabitants of this country consider themselvs Christians, which very naturally causes them to speak of the United States as a Christian nation. But officially speaking the United States is not a Christian nation; its Constitution, owing to a grievous oversight on the part of our forefathers, caused doubtless by the wave of Atheism which swept over the civilized world about the time that the foundation of our present government was being laid, does not recognize the existence of a supreme being." Exactly! But if this is not officially a Christian nation, and if less than one-third of the population are members of the Christian church, what becomes of the intelligent persons who answer the question in the affirmativ? The country is civilized, dear Presbyterian preacher, and therefore not Christian.

Letters from Friends.

JASPER, ALA., Aug. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to ask Henry Rowley one or two questions:

1. Can there be responsibility under compulsion?

2. Must we not hav liberty or freedom before we can be held responsible?

Unless we hav freedom we are slaves to the power that prevents.

Mr. Rowley's answers to Mr. Chapin's questions are evasiv. Because Mr. Huxley or Darwin are superior does that giv them the right to make slaves or deny freedom?

J. K. DEARTH.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZ., July 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of July 12th, under the caption of "Heywood, Harman, and Reed," is an article by Converse Close which, to my mind, voices the sentiments of all fair and right-minded people. For my part I hav no use for cranks, Anarchists, or immoral monstrosities, and that class of cattle are not martyrs in any sense, nor do they deserve the sympathy of any good citizen, Liberal or otherwise. I am an outspoken Liberal and one known all over the territory as one who not only disbelieves in the Bible and its teachings, but despises the dirty book. I had rather shake the hand of a contemptible petty larceny thief than the hand of a hypocrit. A hypocrit is more despicable than the ordinary liar or thief. ALBERT F. BANTA.

LOST VALLEY, ORE., July 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money for the book of pictures. My vote is for the pictures every time. And as for hurting the Christian's feelings, there never was a time when he tried to spare the feelings of him that honestly differed from him; his common cry is, "Oh, you don't believe what you say—you say so to be different from others." He is not willing to acknowledge you can differ from him and be honest in your belief. John Peck is worth one-half of your writers. If we had a few more Liberals like him we would hav a good deal less law against us. In Oregon we work Sunday or Saturday or any day we feel like it. There is more religious freedom here than in any other place. Over two-thirds are Liberals, only so many do not work for the cause. ALEX. HARDIE.

CLARA, LA., Aug. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since Anthony Comstock's attack on D. M. Bennett, and hav done what I could to add to its subscription list; hav sent it about thirty new subscribers in all, some of which are permanent members of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, while some failed to renew when their subscription expired. I always giv away my papers after I hav read them, usually sending them by mail to those who I think will read them. My family all read and enjoyed THE TRUTH SEEKER. My mother, who died last February, aged eighty-six years, always read THE TRUTH SEEKER first, though we took several other papers.

I regard the editorial management of the paper for the last few years as just perfect. May the Editor liv long and prosper. I. L. ALLEN.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN., Aug. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Jenny Linn, wife of our old Liberal friend, Jesse B. Linn, living at Caurson's Grove, Mitchell county, Kan., died August 1st, at four o'clock, at the age of thirty-five years. She leaves a husband and several children to mourn her death. She was respected and loved by all who knew her. She was a loving, tender mother; an affectionate wife; a just and upright neighbor, and an honor to the community in which she lived, always ready and willing to help the needy and the distressed. To know her was to admire her. She was a true Liberal in her belief. Having been brought up under strict church influence until after her marriage, she then commenced to think for herself and act accordingly. She maintained her right mind and was sensible up to within a very short time of her death. Her husband asked her if she had changed her mind in regard to her belief, and she said that she had not. He then asked her if she wanted a preacher to preach her funeral, and she said that she did not, but if they said anything at her funeral she wanted some of our people, a Liberal if any at all. Yours truly, W. H. NOAH.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Aug. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been absent from home several weeks, nearly four of which I spent with our good friends the Geigers in Hudson. How is it, if one wishes to find persons who are really awake to the alarming strides which the church is making toward controling the government, that we must go among people born in monarchial countries? I do not mean that an American is willing that our government should become ecclesiastic, but we are so slow to see danger, so slow to use "the ounce of prevention" which is "worth more than the pound of cure." The Geigers were born in Germany. They know the meaning of monarchy, and hence are awake to the needs of wise precaution. Hav you ever been in Hudson, a little city so satisfied with itself that it makes no attempt at growth? I remember sixty-five years ago my father talking about the city of Hudson, and saying, among other things, that they had Universalist preaching there. At that time Universalism was heresy, more to be avoided than Freethought to-day. At first thought, it seemed strange to me that, having so many years a Liberal church in Hudson, there should not be a large Secular League in a flourishing condition, but perhaps it is because, having destroyed the hell of Christianity, they do not realize that the hell which the church is preparing for us in this present life will, if allowed its way, be as intolerable as the one which has been the dread of all believers.

Faithfully yours, LUCY N. COLMAN.

EUREKA, CAL., July 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Ever since the pictures commenced in THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav made it a practice to cut out those on the last page and paste them into a scrap-book. Being well acquainted with the Bible, I can appreciate them. Is there any hope of those pictures ever being printed in book form? If so, I will no longer cut them out of the paper. If printed, I should want several copies. As our Eureka clergymen relieve me of the task of praying, they doing it for me, I should like to reciprocate the favor by sending them those Bible pictures. The fact is, I love to worry them, and they hav lost all courage to retaliate; a few of them tried it and got worsted, so I hav the field to myself.

Is it not a pity that our friends, Heywood and Harman, cannot keep out of the obscenity business? They do the cause more harm than good. I hav no doubt that sexual abuses exist, but it is so absurd to describe them, as that cannot remedy the evil. Mrs. Heywood seems to hav a prurient taste for obscene expressions. No doubt to her they convey nothing wrong, but she ought to consider that few people are like her. ROBERT GUNTHER.

[We shall print the Bible pictures in book form. We hope, also, to soon resume their publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Heston is seeking health among the mountains of Colorado; may he find it speedily! His address is still Carthage, Mo., as his wife will forward letters.—ED. T. S.]

RED CANON, WYO., Aug. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The conviction of an immortality is the primal nucleus around which superstitions cluster.

The man who offers another a bribe is apt to be angry if his offer is refused, also he who attempts to terrify another becomes indignant if his attempt fails. We hav all heard Spiritualists, of the Christian and Antichristian sorts, expatiate upon their supposed paradise, and they declare that it is a place more congenial to believers than unbelievers. In short, he who accepts the proof and believes will be favored in paradise, but he who rejects it will be more or less damned. Here is the bribe on the one hand, the attempt to strike terror on the other.

He who preaches paradise or spirit-land to impress those who hear him must clothe himself with an assumed authority. Thus Gods were invented that priests might be respected. Thus occult powers, inspiration, special communion with spirits, etc., hav been asserted for the same purpose. Where one man convinces another that he receives authority from a God or spirits, has occult powers or is inspired, he becomes the guardian of his convicted subject. The convert is the slave, he the master. The convert has accepted the bribe in the form of future bliss, and the holy agent has one more fish in his net. Of course, as long as some men are weak enough to be frightened by a threat or to accept a bribe mediumistic and clerical, speculators will sell shares in paradise and their slave trade will continue. Immortality is the very alcohol of superstition, and the apathy to this life which its narcotic properties induce is a condition most favorable to superstitious growth.

DR. C. E. BOYNTON.

NEWARK, N. J., Aug. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Last week I missed your cartoons.* Your paper did not look natural, but if they are too expensiv I suppose your subscribers can do without them. Poor people cannot indulge in luxuries. If we can get bare necessities we are lucky. It is only the rich monopolists, officeholders, cardinals, nuncios, and Bishop Corrigan and his priests, that liv in marble and brown-stone houses, that can get luxuries, and only Tammany chiefs that can rusticate in Germany for the good of their health while the poor Catholic has to eke out a miserable existence on the top floor of a miserable tenement house. I happened to meet a poor Catholic grieving for her husband. I asked her where her husband was. "Dead," she answered. "How long has he been dead?" "Sixteen years, and I wish I was dead to go to him." "You would never be able to overtake him." "Do you mean that, every word?" "Ma'am, you see, this planet is traveling one thousand miles an hour, twenty-four thousand in twenty-four hours; some planets thirty-five miles a second, two thousand one hundred miles a minute. Now, ma'am, I've been told a soul travels three times as fast. Now, if your husband's soul has been traveling thirty-five miles a second for sixteen years, and nobody's soul was known to travel faster, how can you ever think to overtake your husband?" She did not understand the reckoning—and I did not either, so I bid her good-bye and told her to read THE TRUTH SEEKER and she would giv less to the priest if she continued to read it a few weeks. She took a squint at your patriarchs, Abraham, Solomon, and David, and thought that they were "quare-looking" disciples of God. Just then an Italian was overturning her garbage-box and she drove him away, and exclaimed, "You damned, bloody Italian, yees ought to be driven out of the country." I answered, "And all the rest of the Italian Irish who acknowledge and worship an Italian as a God and holy father. All such people impoverish themselvs and country, and are better dead than alive, for they are only in people's way. They are more dead than alive, and ought to be buried." Respectfully, W. W. MORRIS.

Aug. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: No subterfuge of the Roman Catholic hierarchy can stifle or hide from the view of the people the fact that it is the deliberate and thoroughly organized plan of their priests to rob them of their hard-earned wages. Ever since Christian rascality has had existence the way has been laid open to defraud the laborer by overtaxing him and all who labor for their own support. And who are they that do not pay the just share of taxes upon the property owned by themselvs? It is always the pious Christians who own church property. They shirk out of doing justly by making a law to exempt their costly synagogs, cathedrals, universities, and other places where worship is mumbled and its priest is paid therefor. His life is held as sacred, and is supported if the laborer himself with his family are starved out of their journey of life. Now, it is high time to do simple justice. Repeal all exemption laws. Collect the taxes on every kind of property. Do justice to the wage-earners, and when this is done they can make their own holidays. All else in rankest mental slavery. With the God idea incorporated into the Constitution a class of overzealous men would hasten to make known the will of a fabulous God, as founded on certain passages of scripture, and their own belief of them, which is no basis at all, for these beliefs and these faiths hav been wrangled over for fifteen centuries without the prospect of a settlement upon a truthful basis. What then can be done save to force man to accept a form of religious belief which he cannot and will not believe to be true? Compulsion makes man a hypocrit, and less truthful, and has all the direful effects of falsehood. Falsehood constitutes the basis of church organization to-day, as it has in the past ages, to the exclusion of truth. Through this false system of teaching the people are kept in ignorance, and for such a condition are heavily taxed out of their substance of living. If the priests would let the people alone they would fare much better, but the preposterous claim of delegated power over the race demands of them their earnings. We know of no power that will break the thraldom and release the people save the ministry of angels, the bright immortal spirits. They hav opened channels of communication with the people of earth, and we believe their ministry will be permanent. They hav come to stay, even though the maledictions of priests may be loud and bitter. Man is of more importance than church dogmas. E. P. G.

TYNGSBORO, MASS, Aug. 5, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I propose the following answers to Mr. Chapin's questions:

Q. What evidence hav we of any God? A. None. A God who is so poor a God as not to be known to all as a God, is not worth calling a God.

Q What evidence hav we of immortality? A. The immortals themselvs, if any. Theories and beliefs, inspirations and testimony, do not count. When you shall hav lived forever you will find out.

Q. What authority can one man rightfully hav over another? A. The authority to keep him off your toes and to prevent him from pulling your nose.

Q. How is the rule of the majority any less destructiv to freedom than the rule of a monarch? A. By being the rule of the majority instead of that of a monarch.

Q What right does man hav to what he does not earn? A. What right has a baby to his breakfast? Did you earn the sunlight? One has a right to what is given him by those who earned it.

Q. What right has any man to hold vacant land out of use? A. The right he has to hold a horse when he is not riding.

Q. What right does one man, or combination of men, hav to monopolize the issue of money? A. The right the people hav, by their representativs, to see that every fool or fraud who takes a notion does not flood the country with worthless paper and bogus coin.

Q. On what grounds can compulsory taxation be enforced? A. On the ground of common benefits. When you are shipwrecked, and tumble in a boat with a score of other fellows, and hav to row them ashore because they are too drunk or too lazy to help, you will begin to learn political economy.

Q. Are interest, rent, and profits earned by the receivers? A. They are, if the receivers are printers, and hav to wear out $2 worth of leather to collect $1 worth of subscription.

Q. Can they be collected without force? A. Yes, if those who owe it are honest and hav the lucre.

Q. What right has a policeman to use force? A. The right your hired man has to protect your house, your wife, or yourself. That is what a policeman is.

Q. What right has any man, or any body of men, to interfere with the absolute freedom of the human race? A. He doesn't. They can't. The absolute is irresistible.

JOHN P. GUILD.

OVERTON, GA., Aug. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Of all the Liberal periodicals which chance has permitted me to see, I like THE TRUTH SEEKER best, and as everything should hav a reason I will explain why this is the case. In the first place, you do not let your prejudices blind your better judgment; secondly, you do not join a new movement until you are satisfied that it is in the line of progress.

I am afraid you hav but few subscribers in this section of the country. Yet, do not take it for granted that there is no Rationalism among us. The trouble is that we are not organized. The Southern mind is not, as a rule, aggressiv. There is manifested nearly everywhere a laissez-faire sentiment which says, "Let me alone and I'll let you alone." Outside of the exemption of church property from taxation we hav hardly a grievance against the church. Again, political persecution has been waged against us by the general government so mercilessly that we Liberals hav come to regard the inroads of the church as matters of slight moment. What with monopolies, protection for the rich, trusts, depletion of the treasury to feed pension sharks, appointment to office of thieving negroes by Holy John, prostitution of justice by the federal courts, expulsion of legally elected

Congressmen, and, to crown all, that infamy of infamies, the Force bill—is it much less than a miracle that there should be a man among us bold enough to array himself against that giant fraud, modern Christianity? In spite of all this, however, we hav a large skeptical element among us, and all it needs is to be aroused. The South is very conservativ, but all the world knows with what vim she takes hold of a thing when once set in motion. My opinion is that if the right man were to come among us giving Liberal talks, he could, in a short time, establish a Free-thought movement equal to that of any state in the Union. By the right man I mean one well informed, a good orator, and especially one who does not know more about us than we know about ourselvs. That last kind of a man the least bigoted among us cannot tolerate.

If there is one thing, Mr. Editor, against which you manifest more opposition than another, it is papacy. In this war, I doubt not that you hav reason, but bear in mind the old adage, "Giv the devil his due." Among the iniquities against which you wield your potent pen, there is one which, if my knowledge of history serves me right, was not inflicted upon us by Catholics. I mean the Sunday laws. If I am rightly informed, the opinion recently advanced by Cardinal Gibbons is the same that is held and acted upon by the mass of the Catholic world. It is a well-known fact that in our ultra-Catholic Southern cities the stores and theaters are allowed to be open and unmolested on Sunday. One good deed can sometimes atone for a mass of wrong.

There are two reforms which, I am sorry to say, hav never been advocated to any extent in THE TRUTH SEEKER. One of these is the holding of elections, state and national, on Sundays. Perhaps your correspondents and yourself think it would be a little premature to attack this question, when we hav not yet evolved from the hideous Puritan Sabbath. Indeed, I fear that it might be dangerous to agitate the subject in such states as New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Still, if the subject were constantly broached, it might set the minds of some people to thinking.

The other reform I speak of is one which may not strictly come under your domain, but it is one the very name of which brings up before my mind the startling fossilism of this so-called free republic. I refer to the metrical system of weights and measures. If any of your readers should for a moment doubt the immense advantages of this system let them make a calculation in English money and then go over the same in dollars and cents. With the metrical system all of our business transactions, all calculations in weights and measures, would be fully as much simplified. The only argument that can possibly be advanced against this system is: "It's so hard to change." It is a standing disgrace both to this oligarchy and to Great Britain that Catholic Spain and the South American republics hav adopted for their beautiful language an almost perfect orthography and hav given their citizens a perfect system of weights and measures, while the two English-speaking giantesses still cling to the barbarous and anomalous orthography of past ages and adhere to that fossilized relic, the present system of weights and measures. A bas l'oppression.

MR. EDITOR: If it is not too assuming, I hope that you will allow me a little space in the columns of your most highly appreciated journal.

I wish to giv a few reasons why I am not, would not, and could not be a Christian. In the first place, I would hav to believe that the Bible is of divine authenticity. I cannot believe this, for several reasons, viz., in my estimation it is inconsistent, unreasonable, unjust, and untrue in regard to the manner of creation, that to my mind is totally absurd, short-sighted, and groundless. I cannot conceive how anything can be brought into existence or annihilated. All of my experience and observation and that of the entire world as recorded proves that not even the least atom can be literally made or destroyed. It is a well-defined law of nature that anything which has one end necessarily has another, therefore if everything had a beginning everything will necessarily hav an end, God included. If one thing could exist without a beginning, then everything could exist without a beginning.

If the Bible be true, man knew not good from evil until he had eaten of the forbidden fruit. Then what justice can there be in damning a man for doing evil when he knows not good from evil? And, worse still, what justice or reason could there be in damning thousands of men, women, and children unborn for an act that they could not possibly avoid or hav anything at all to do with? And besides, what harm was there in eating of the fruit? Is it harm to become wise, to know good from evil? And, too, did they die that day? Preachers say that they died in trespass and in sin. Whom did they trespass against? Did not they leave enough fruit for God, or did he not already hav knowledge of good and evil? Was it a sin to know good from evil? Is God so selfish that he did not wish anyone else to know good from evil? Is this God's will toward his children, that they should liv in absolute ignorance, know not good from evil? And in many other instances what does the Bible accuse God of? Is it just, reasonable, or right for God to harden Pharaoh's heart to prevent his doing a certain thing and then drown the poor Egyptians for it, and not only once but several times; and again, to send the angel to kill the first-born (poor little innocent babies) in every house that had not blood sprinkled on the door-posts? And in many instances God is made the author of the most cruel and wicked wars that were ever known; in one instance commanding his men to murder all, even women and children, except the unmarried women and maidens who had not known men by lying with them, and use these as wives—that is, ravish them if necessary, as their wills were not to be considered at all. And finally they accuse him of adultery or fornication, as he indulged in sexual intercourse with a woman who was married and got her with child, and practiced such a fraud on the poor man Joseph that he never knew her until the child was born. They also make the father and son only one; and now after God had become so mad at Adam for eating of the fruit he formed a great scheme of salvation, that is, he should come himself and suffer and die that he himself might forgiv his child for eating the fruit. That reminds me of the editor who got so mad at himself that he hired a boot-black to kick him out of his office; or the doctor who got so mad at himself that he went and burnt his new hat up to spite himself.

And how is this to save a man, simply by believing on him or his name? St. Paul says, by faith alone, not by works, lest any man should boast. How much worse is it to boast of works than of faith? Who will say that it is not noble to make an earnest effort to do what you sincerely think is right? And upon the contrary, what good is there in faith alone. Now, what justice is there in murdering Christ the just for man the unjust, Christ the innocent for man the guilty? Is this the principle of a God whom we wish to worship?

But now, what is essential to become a Christian or a disciple of Christ? According to the Bible, viz., Luke xiv, 36, we are to hate father, mother, brother, sister, wife, and children before we can be Christians or disciples of Christ. I am quite glad that I am not a disciple of Christ, and hav not any desire to be.

And again, see Matt. x, 34, 35: "I came not to send peace but the sword. For I am come to set man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law."

And again, we read: "To you it is given to understand the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is given in parables lest they might believe and be converted."

As for myself, I prefer to believe in and worship the great god of justice, virtue, and truth, and to love, worship, and obey these principles, not from fear of punishment or hope of reward, but from principle.

I hav no war to make upon the moral teachings of any of the churches. It is probably well enough to hav such restraints thrown around those who cannot do right from principle. But let me obey the dictates of an honest and sincere conscience. In the language of the immortal poet:

The fear of hell's the hangman's whip
That holds the wretch in order;
But when I feel my conscience sting,
Let this e'er be my border;
At slightest touches instant pause,
Débar all such pretenses,
And resolutely keep these laws,
Unheeding consequences.

D. J. TUCKER, M.D.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Aug. 5, 1890.

FELLOW TRUTH SEEKERS: In my communication published in "Letters from Friends," in our noble champion, THE TRUTH SEEKER, of July 6, 1890, I referred you to the clause in our Constitution of the United States in which it is expressly provided that our Union shall be perpetual. I will now endeavor to call your attention to some of those clauses in that great and important document which provide that no generation shall saddle upon any subsequent generation conditions which, to them, might be burdensome or odious. The first clause in that solemn document which bears upon this vital and paramount subject, is the very preamble itself. By that word "justice," in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, no generation is permitted to hand down to succeeding generations any conditions of government that, to them, might be distasteful, unpleasant, or odious.

In Sec. 10, Art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States it is provided that no state shall emit bills of credit. Now, the great law lexicographer Bouvier, in his Standard Law Dictionary, says that a bill of credit is a promis to pay, emitted by a state, bearing no interest, intended to circulate as money, and redeemable at a future date; and Noah Webster, in his great standard dictionary of the English language, says that a bill of credit is a bill or note for raising money on the mere credit of the state.

Now, fellow-citizens and truth seekers, I am going to show and point out to you wherein, and why, all bonds that hav ever been emitted by any state in our Union, and consequently, all bonds that hav been emitted by any city, county, or other creature of the state, to meet the principal or interest of or on which the people must writhe under an onerous and burdensome taxation (robbery), are so many outrages; are unconstitutional, and, so soon as the people hav awakened to a sense of the horrid situation into which the shysters and tricksters called lawyers and judges, in bribery, and for mammon the millionaire bondholders, hav sunk our posterity, those bonds will be null and void. If so, hav the people not been robbed of every cent that they may hav, in the form of taxes, paid to pay interest or principal on state, city, or county bonds? If so, should the people not establish an equal division of wealth, throughout the entire country, in order to recover that of which they hav been robbed? By and through these robberies that hav been perpetrated against us, more than fifty per cent of the wealth of the entire Union is now in the possession of less than twenty-five thousand persons.

Our Revolutionary fathers gave us a Constitution which, if we take care of it and see to it that it be not outraged, will protect us and our posterity also. But, down to this date, this we hav not done. Did not the aristocratic, murdering swindlers influence the shysters who, under oath, were vested with power to discharge the functions of the positions of judges of our Supreme Court of the United States, to hold and decide that chattel slavery was established, fostered, and protected by the Constitution of the United States, and that people were proper articles of merchandise, while none of the words slave, slavery, negro, black, mulatto, yellow, African, or white ever occupied place in that great document, from the very foundation of our government down to the time when, to sanction the decisions of shysters of antebellum times, and after the inauguration of the slavemongers' rebellion, and in supererogation, the word slavery was placed in the thirteenth amendment by the Republico-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party? I say in supererogation because, by that word "justice" in the preamble, and that word "people" in the fourth amendment, from its very beginning that Constitution abolished slavery in the United States.

At the time when those great statesmen, the framers of the Constitution of the United States, were in convention, earnestly discussing every word and sentence of that great sheet-anchor of our liberties (though not so unless we see to it that its provisions be honestly and punctually executed), it was thought by some of them that, if they were to permit the state to emit bills of credit, "promises to pay emitted by a state, bearing no interest, intended to circulate as money, and redeemable at a future date," the state could, whenever the money-changers might hav so manipulated our currency as to hav caused ruinous stagnation in the channels of business and starvation among the people, step forward in her sovereign capacity, and, by emitting bills of credit, which, though not legal tenders, might circulate as money, and be made receivable for taxes, thus throw the mantle of protection around the industries of her people, and alleviate their sufferings brought on by the money panic, and in the midst of an abundant harvest, and with store-houses overstocked with the products of the mills. But by others of those great and patriotic statesmen it was thought that, if they were to permit the state to emit bills of credit, the people might rush onward in their haste to become rich and mighty, and, in their great prosperity and progress, heedlessly emit a great many bills of credit, which, while they might alleviate present suffering, and for the time afford the people protection from the villainy of the money-sharks, might, in the form of a debt, be handed down from generation to generation, and posterity yet unborn might come on and be compelled to writhe under an onerous taxation for the purpose of liquidating and paying off a debt with the creation of which they had nothing to do. This, those great statesmen thought, would be a flagrant trespass upon the grounds of justice, morality, and righteousness. Therefore they, as above stated, provided in our Constitution that no state shall emit bills of credit.

Now, if, on that ground, and while recognizing the inestimable benefits that might accrue to the people by the state emitting bills of credit, they prohibited it from doing so, how, in the name of common sense and decency, can that Constitution be held to imply that those great patriots intended to grant to the States the power to emit doubled and twisted, interest-bearing bills of credit, not intended to circulate as money and alleviate the sufferings of the people in times of money panic, but to be locked up in the coffers of some shylock in Hamburg, Berlin, London, New York, or Boston, and, on which to pay the interest, this shylock may intensify the horrors of a money panic by levying a withering, blighting tribute upon the already crippled industries of the state?

No, fellow truth seekers, and fellow-citizens, they never intended any such thing! All state bonds, county bonds, and city bonds are surely utterly unconstitutional, or the Constitution of the United States is the greatest enemy and curse that was ever inflicted upon mankind.

Now, fellow-citizens, is it any wonder that more than fifty per cent of the entire wealth of this great republic is in the possession of less than twenty-five thousand persons, robbers, cormorants, leeches?

The average gawky seems to think that he can trust the management of our government to the millionaires, and to their parasites, the shysters and tricksters called lawyers and judges. This they hav done, and are doing; and so long as they continue so to do all the hard-earned proceeds from the labor of the poor people will continue to be dumped into the coffers of the millionaires.

Noah Webster says that "bribery is the paying or receiving of a reward for the performance of that which is known to be illegal or unjust." Now, we know that for a retainer (Webster calls it a bribe) the lawyer will stalk into our courts, and attempt (often succeeding) to prostitute those courts to the villainy of convicting a person whom he knows to be innocent, or the acquitting of one whom he knows to be guilty; or to that of taking property from the lawful and equitable owner thereof and placing it in the possession of a person who he knows has no lawful or equitable ownership to it. In so doing, the lawyer perpetrates a villainous outrage, or is accessary after the fact, or he is a robber, and is subsidiary to the crime; and nothing in equity can be found to absolve him therefrom. He is also a perjured villain; for when he enters upon his professional career, he does so, and rightfully too, under an oath that, throughout that career, he will support, maintain, and defend the constitution of the United States, and of the state in which he may practice his profession, and the laws made pursuant thereto, and that he will be true to the interests of his client, within the law of course, but no further. When the lawyer takes that oath, he does so with the intention of violating it. Hence he is a perjured villain! These old, well-practiced bribe-takers who know how to take a bribe and avoid detection, are the very men whom the gawkies elect to all the positions in which it pays to hav a chance to practice bribery.

No lawyer should ever be elected to any position under the flag except to that of city, county, or state attorney, or attorney-general, and even then he should be under strict surveillance.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Be Something.

The Christians cry—"Oh, to be nothing!"
Of fear-inspired tears weep a flood;
Whilst sins they confess unto loathing,
And beg to be saved by spilt blood.
They wish to hav wings to reach heaven,
And sing with a sanctified whine;
Like herds they are wheedled and driven
To creep as though dirt were divine.

Such groaning for glory's a notion
To hope giving garments of gloom;
The old gospel grace is a potion
That blights fairest fruit in the bloom.
So sure as the stars shine in heaven,
The form of the faith is unsound
When by its devotion is driven
Humility into the ground.

If powers enthroned in high heaven—
Jove, Jesus, or Buddha, or Brahm—
Should ever to passion be given,
And at me grow angry and damn;
Then, past all logical doubting.
Their verdict's sub-warrant would be,
Because I'm incarnated nothing—
The vain no salvation can free.

If my aspiration were given
To Jesus, Jove, Buddha, or Brahm—
Those powers enthroned in high heaven,
So wise and so strong and so calm—
I own myself pious in one thing:
I'd thank them for thinking of me,
And ask their aid I might be something,
Something that's worthy to see.

Paths.

[Here is a queer and amusing fantasy in the way of a poem in the Yankee Blade:]

The path that leads to a Loaf of Bread
Winds through the Swamps of Toil,
And the path that leads to a Suit of Clothes
Goes through a flowerless soil.
And the paths that lead to a Loaf of Bread
And the Suit of Clothes are hard to tread.

And the path that leads to a House of your Own
Climbs over the bowldered hills,
And the path that leads to a Bank Account
Is swept by the blast that kills;
But the men who start in the paths to-day
In the Lazy Hills may go astray.

In the Lazy Hills are trees of shade
By the dreamy brooks of Sleep,
And the rollicking River of Pleasure laughs,
And gambols down the steep;
But when the blasts of winter come,
The brooks and rivers are frozen dumb.

Then woe to those in the Lazy Hills
When the blasts of winter moan,
Who strayed from the path to a Bank Account,
And the path to a Home of their Own.
These paths are hard in the summer heat,
But in winter they lead to a snug retreat.

Thoughts on Reading.

No private entertainment and pastime affects the people at the present time more than reading, and especially novel reading.

Literature is one of the fine arts, and as we wish to cultivate a taste for good literature we must be able to discriminate between the good and bad—that which is wholesome and valuable and that which is worthless. It is not my intention to undermine novel reading but to state that it is the kind which we must be careful in selecting. It affects each person in proportion to the indulgence and their understanding of the subject in hand. It has two principal effects, which differ widely and may be plainly observed. One is exalting, elevating the reader's ideal to a point only attainable by a few; the other low, degrading, demoralizing, lowering the individual, morally and physically, and ultimately the remaining day of his life will be one of misery and repentance. It is well known that it affects different persons in dissimilar ways. To one it may incite all that is great and good, to others it may be a curse. Some may read understandingly, others may not. Can some persons not be affected at all by novel reading? The answer is, no. They are affected in one of the above-mentioned directions. One raising the reader to all that is sublime, beautiful, and good, and the other lowering the individual.

The reading of good literature must be cultivated the same as other arts—as music, painting, drawing, poetry. In music you may at first appreciate the lively waltz and quickstep, next the slow and solemn march, and then the song, which speaks more delicacy and refinement than all the others, and in which the finer chords of the heart are touched. In painting we will not at first see those minute points and touches in nature which make her beautiful, but by cultivation and practice they will soon enter into the picture and beautify it. So by cultivation and careful discrimination we may improve ourselvs greatly in literature.

Next we will notice differences by different persons reading the same work. One reader of "Kenilworth" or English history might think Queen Elizabeth a proud, haughty queen, who took great advantage of her power and position, while another may think she always did the best thing at the right time.

One may think Carlyle a poor hypochondriac person, whose productions are not, for that reason, to be regarded worthy, while others may profit by the careful reading of them. Next we may refer to Joan of Arc, about whom many different conclusions are formed. Some would think her a meek Christian heroin, who strove to do all she could for the king and her country, while her life could hav been one of perpetual happiness and she a joy and comfort to her parents and a blessing to her friends, all of whom she had forsaken. But no, she forsook all to aid her country's cause. Others think her a willful, stubborn girl who acted rashly, unheeded parental authority, spurned wise advice, and rushed forward madly and heedlessly with a manner quite unnatural and unbecoming a wise girl.

Many in similar cases would follow the example of Joan of Arc, while others would deem it unwise to do so.

It is a much disputed matter as to what is good reading and what is unfit to be read. The question of selecting good reading matter is best decided by the good sense of the reader. If we read that which will enlarge and awaken our mind to new and better ideas we may safely say we read that which is pure, wholesome and stimulating to the mind, and will be of inestimable value to us, as well as widening the horizon of our thoughts. It would be difficult, as well as useless, to mention a list of good books to be read, for those omitted in the endless list would be read the same as those in the list.

It is well known that it is the nature of beings to do that which is forbidden. The inborn principle of curiosity is aroused which craves to be satisfied. As it is a natural principle, its rightful purpose is to stimulate in us a spirit of inquiry, a desire for knowledge.

If a child is forbidden the reading of Paine's "Age of Reason," it may be depended upon he will get it.

Books ought not to be forbidden children. It would be safe to leave them the entire bookcase, for if there are any books denounced, they will be read first. We hav all observed the effect of denouncing "Robert Elsmere" to the public.

It is well to read any kind of book, but good sense must be exercised in retaining that which is good and rejecting that which is bad.

LEONORA STOCKINGER.

Correspondence.

VERSAILLES, IND., Aug. 5, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send an original essay which you may hav printed in the Corner if you think it proper and desirable.

If my effort givs any encouragement to the younger readers and tends to awaken in their thoughts new ideas on the subject of "Reading," or any other subject, I will hav accomplished the greater part of my purpose.

I fully appreciate the efforts of the children of the Corner, and as I am an instructor of children in a district school in winter, I take much interest in all children who are trying to succeed and learn all they can. With best wishes to the Corner, I am,

Your friend, LEONORA STOCKINGER.

[Our friend will please accept our thanks for her instructiv essay on Reading. It is a pleasure to know that we number among the friends of the Corner minds as bright as that of Miss Stockinger and others who favor our columns with their bright thoughts.—ED. C. C.]

WOODLAND, WASH., July 10, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This afternoon I will write a letter to the Children's Corner. I go to school, and I am in the fifth reader, third geography, third hygiene and spelling, highest arithmetic, second history. I enjoy my school very much. Our school was closed the 2d of July. I am thirteen years old. I hav one brother older than I am and three brothers and one sister younger than I am. We liv in a wide country, about two miles from a very small town named Woodland. The Fourth of July was celebrated about a mile from our home. My father has only taken the grand TRUTH SEEKER about a year and a half, but I don't think he could do without it now. I am glad to say that I am a Liberal; there are a good many church members around here, but I think there are just as many Freethinkers. This is my first letter, and I hope it won't hav to be taken to the wastebasket. If it appears in the Corner I will soon write again. Hoping all the Freethinkers success, I will close.

Yours for truth, ANNIE BALLHORN.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: The letter I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 9, 1890, from John Kraft, Ill., amused me very much. He and I are of the same age (thirteen years); and I hav five pets, but no fox among them. What a strange pet to hav! I had to laugh when I read that part of his letter, it was so strange to think of a boy having a fox for a pet.

I hav a large white cat (I call her "Beauty;" she is seven years of age and was born on Washington's birthday), two canary birds, a pretty talking parrot, and a dear little dog whose name is "Governor," because he was born in a large flat house which my stepfather built last winter.

My stepfather is a Freethinker and he has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven years. I always read the Children's Corner, because you make it so interesting. I will send you my stepfather's card. I hope this letter is not too long. From,

Your little friend, GERALDINE CREED.

P.S.—John Kraft, of Grant Fork, Ill., is the boy I refer to.

SOUTH BOSQUE, TEX., July 31, 290.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it has been a long time since I last entered the dear old Corner I feel I would like to step in and tell you how we are getting along. I went to hear the good brothers talk to their flock last Sabbath. They preached and prayed two or three days Did not save any more souls, but carried off a TRUTH SEEKER and "Bible Contradictions," given them by my father. We hav lots of Liberals in this country, but some are not brave enough to come out and acknowledge their belief. My cousins tell me of a ten days' meeting in Grayson county, Tex., and not a single soul saved. It must be very discouraging to the poor followers of the lamb, but I do not see any way for them to console themselvs unless they bend the knee to the all-powerful one who they claim helps them in their troubles. I hav just read a speech delivered by George Remsburg at a Fourth of July celebration, and I think it is splendid. He is an intelligent young man. Long may he liv to help lead on the good work. As our good old workers leave our land I hope the young may be able to take their place. With love and good wishes to all the friends, I am, Very respectfully yours,

ELEANOR MARRS PARKS.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 25, 290.

DEAR CHILDREN: You hav all taken an interest in R. M. Casey and I write now to tell you he is in extreme need. He will probably not liv many months; he says he is never free from headache and other pains, and unable to earn a penny and for a long time has received no aid. He would gladly sleep the last sleep, but one can't sleep at will and so he must suffer on. He needs your words of kindness as well as a few dimes to buy him food, so I hope you will write him, each one of you, and send at least ten cents in stamps. Address R. M. Casey, Five Forks, S. C., or if you prefer, send your contributions to me and I'll forward them to him. Send now so as to be sure and not neglect it. We shall probably all be helpless some day if we liv long enough, so now is our time to help others and earn help for ourselvs and be living, loving, kindly examples to others.

Affectionately,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

[It is distressing and humiliating to ask alms; more distressing and humiliating is it to need alms. The children and friends of our Corner hav, not long ago, by dime donations, purchased a cow for Mr. Casey, but they will, no doubt, be ready to assist him farther. It should be remembered, however, that children hav only small means, and it requires a good many dimes to support one man who is feeble and infirm. In the opinion of the editor of the Corner, it would be better for some person to make suitable inquiries into the facts of Mr. Casey's actual condition, whether he has friends and relativs able to assist him, and what are his wants and necessities. Then make a plain statement of his situation in the Liberal press, and the claims he may hav upon the Liberals of the land for support. A fund might then be started by grown people, who could render more efficient aid than little children.—ED. C. C.

[P. S.—In the mean time anyone desirous of forwarding money to Mr. Casey can follow the above directions.—ED. C. C.]

In a Different Set.

"Now, pray for Susie Bates," said Mrs. Simeral to six-year-old Flossie, who was saying her prayers; "Susie is quite sick."

"Why, mamma," said Flossie, "I can't pray for her. She doesn't belong to our crowd."—Epoch.

News of the Week.

THE great railroad strike in Wales has been won by the men.

BUSINESS men of New York are petitioning against the Force bill, as it would injure their Southern trade.

CARDINAL NEWMAN, of England, is dead. He was renowned for his literary knowledge and elegant writing of English.

SWINBURNE, the English Radical and Freethinking poet, has published a poem crying vehemently for the killing of the czar.

THE best record between Queenstown, Ireland, and New York was accomplished on the 13th by the Teutonic in 5 days 19 hours 5 minutes.

AT Swindon, England, a beautiful young lady named Miss Marion Ormond charges Rev. N. E. Howe with taking liberties with her in a wood by the church.

A UNIVERSAL Catholic Congress will be held in Belgium next month to discuss "The Temporal Power of the Pope," and urge Christian governments to enforce the restoration of it.

CATHOLICS are indignant that owing to Brazil's deposal of the clergy from the control of cemeteries "Atheists, sensualists, drunkards, and persecutors will hav their resting-place along with the faithful."

BELGIAN workmen demand that universal suffrage which is enjoyed in France and Germany, and of which they are as destitute as the Russian peasants. They will strike September 1st unless it is granted. Trouble is apprehended.

THE suppression of religious guilds and reclamation of their property will necessitate the closing in Rome alone of twenty-eight or more churches. Some will be turned into cafes, theaters, factories, etc., and some will for the present merely be razed.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND missionaries protest against the way in which Catholic missionaries follow up the advance work of the former in all foreign lands and get possession of the missions. They say the conduct of the Catholic and Protestant missionaries is "a scandal to Christianity," and desire the government to stop it.

THE strike on the New York Central railroad continues. Pinkerton men are employed, and at Albany on the 17th four persons were wounded by them, and a riot was narrowly averted. The failure of the strike thus far to obtain success is due to disunion between the Knights and the Locomotiv Engineers. The Knights probably hope much from the presidential aspirations of the president of the road, Chauncey Depew.

ITALIAN Catholics complain that the Vatican "is in a state of siege," and "the sovereign of the rulers of the earth" is denied the privacy of his abode. Crispi, they say, has surrounded his palace with spies who watch every goer and comer. And "besides this indecent system of espionage, the Vatican is surrounded by buildings carried up to enormous hight, sufficient to overlook all that goes on in the inclosure of the structure."

OF nine missionaries from Minnesota and Kansas who recently started into Africa, three hav been murdered and the others are in difficulty and suffering. They were admonished of the imprudence of their choice of route and preparations, but said they were ready to sacrifice themselvs in so high a cause. The fate of these heroic but deceived men swells the great number of cases of misdirected endeavor and devotion for which Christianity is responsible.

IN 1855 Austria agreed in a treaty with the Vatican to permit mixed marriages only when the non-Catholic party to the union agreed that the children should be bred Catholics. In 1868 the Liberals in the Hungarian parliament procured the substitution of a law by which the girls shall belong to the mother's creed and the boys to the father's till they reach majority; and if there is no Protestant minister near the priest may baptize the Protestant child in its own formula. Protestants and Liberals were not able to enforce the law and it remained a dead letter till now, when the minister of public worship requests the bishops to put it in effect.

THERE seems to be no help for the millions of Jews whom Russia will expel to please her intolerant Orthodox church and tyrannical government authorities. If the Porte should undertake a similar persecution of its Christian subjects in Armenia or Crete, all the great powers of Europe would remonstrate. But European diplomacy has never ventured to claim the same right of interference with the home affairs of a great Christian power which it has repeatedly asserted with relation to Mohammedan countries. There is, perhaps, just one way in which the intended persecution can be averted. We hav been told for a generation that the great Hebrew bankers of London, Paris, Vienna, and Berlin are the real masters of Europe, in whose hands are the keys of peace and war. If this be true they hav it in their power to paralyze Russian credit and Russian commerce, and may by threats of doing so save their countrymen.

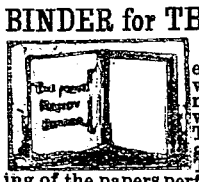
OR,



The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attentior of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indiscretions and excesses. Notes and Clippings.

DR. A. BOSCO, an Italian statistician, has discovered that the greatest number of murders occur in Italy, Spain, and Hungary.

PREMIER CRISPI has ordered a list to be made of all religious houses in Rome, with a view of confiscating those that are liable to suppression under the law.

IN Alpine county, Cal., near the Nevada state line, according to the census-taker, there is no church and no minister, but four liquor-sellers and nine professional gamblers, and yet the jail has not had an inmate since 1887. There is a great moral lesson somewhere here, if one only had time to think it out.

IN Milan nearly two thousand bodies hav been cremated during the last thirteen years. To members of the Cremation Society the cost is only £1. In the case of strangers it is just double that sum. Relativs who oppose the expressed wishes of the deceased to be cremated hav been compelled by the Italian tribunals to carry them into effect.

PRINCE REGENT LUITPOLD, of Bavaria, has made up his mind to abolish the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau because the business has fallen into the hands of some Viennese theatrical speculators and is no longer sacred. It is a wonder that the prince regent didn't demand a percentage of the profits and insist on two performances a day, with an extra matinee on Easter.

THIS is no time, says the Sun, for the Christian host to be divided into hostil camps, each expending its ammunition on the other. Infidelity, their common enemy, is a solid force, arrogant and aggressiv, and with solidified ranks they must go forth to meet it. The war is not now between Protestant and Roman Catholic, but between faith and reason, belief and unbelief.

THE Sacred Heart Review says: "No act of religion will draw greater blessings upon the future life of a married couple, than the celebration of the holy sacrifice of the mass during the nuptials." In view of the fact, comments the Loyal American, that ninety per cent of the drunken wife-beaters handled by the police hav had the mass sung at their nuptials, the foregoing statement will be doubted by many.

THE Christian ladies of Adamsville, Tenn., recently held a meeting and sent a notice to Mr. Phillips to move his whisky out of town in haste. He declined to do so. They then went to his shop and broke in and found several jugs, which they placed on the outside. Mrs. Sallie Woolverton, captain of the squad, took an ax and broke the jugs and spilled their contents. They notified him that if he renewed the traffic in spirits they would hickory-whip him and administer a coat of tar and feathers.

THIS is from the Catholic Union and Times: It appears that a Mrs. Michael Higgins, the wife of a glassblower in Tiffin, O., recently gave birth to her twenty-second child. Commenting upon the fruitful occurrence, the Workingwoman declares that this mother "could furnish more children than all of Rev. Dr. Hall's congregation of 2,800 communicants put together—whose whole number of born babies during the past year was but twelve." Mrs. Higgins is a poor, God-fearing Irish Catholic who obeys the divine command: "Thou shalt not kill."

SENATOR BLAIR, in behalf of the majority of the woman's suffrage committee, the other day reported favorably a proposed constitutional amendment to giv woman the right of suffrage. Senator Blair, in a report accompanying the bill, says: "Prejudice and custom hav denied to woman the suffrage, but it is impossible to giv a reason for the exercise of suffrage by man which does not apply with equal or greater force in favor of woman suffrage." This favorable report follows closely upon the unanimous report of the house committee on the judiciary on the same subject.

IF the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum honestly believe that the enjoyment of works of art on the Sabbath is a sin, it may not be impertinent to ask if they conceal the works of art in their own homes from the eyes of their innocent children. Not that we would care to see this done, for we hav no respect for that brand of superiority. They are displaying such an uncalled-for amount of piety that there is a growing distrust of the sincerity of their motivs. These superlativly good custodians, who are willing to see the entire American public go to the demnition bow-wows, rather than not hav their own way, are in a position where consistency is impossible.—Life.

MR. KENTARO KANEKO, secretary of the Japanese privy council, told a Unitarian association last year that, to his thinking, Unitarianism is the form best adapted to the Japanese mind. "Buddhism in its highest state and Unitarianism," according to Mr. Kaneko, "are just the same," and hence the change would be in name only. Yet he would make the transformation, and for the same reason presented by Mr. Fukuzawa, because "Japanese religion must follow the general tide of civilization," and because it is easier to take "Unitarianism, which comes from the West in the line of civilization, than to build up the old Buddhist doctrin it has had for a thousand years." To him it is merely a matter of policy.

THE Christian Inquirer (Baptist) says: "The sale of the pirated edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica has occasioned a great controversy. A wholesome fear of the law has caused some to desist from, and others, with a fuller understanding of the rights of property, to abandon its sale. It is rather surprising, therefore, that the 'Baptist Book Concern,' at Louisville, Ky., should be found advertising this 'monarch of cyclopedias,' and offering a 'phenomenal opportunity' to those who will subscribe for it. It rightly calls this the 'book sensation of the year,' and probably before long Messrs. Black & Co. will giv this book concern such a 'sensation' as will greatly enlarge its conception of the meaning of that word."

IF report is to be relied on, the Chinese hav still a long way to go before they will be in a position to avail themselvs of the benefits of modern scientific progress. It is stated that the imperial palace, by order of the young emperor, was fitted throughout with electric lights. The imperial cabinet was called together to witness the formal opening of the new system of illumination. Instead, however, of their expressing admiration of the brilliant light, they stood aghast. This wonderful sheen, which came and went at the touch of a button, could only be the offspring of supernatural powers, and was probably a machination of evil spirits. Thus in solemn conclave the mandarins decided, and in a few days the electrical plant was removed.

INVOLUNTARY listeners sometimes hear strange revelations of life in the course of their long trips up and down town on the elevated trains, reports a Sun writer. Two talkativ ladies sat in one of the cross seats on a trip from Grand street to Harlem and poured out a flood of talk into the ears of an amused gentleman sitting behind them, whom they had no idea of entertaining. "Yes," said one of the twain, "my oldest boy has left the church in 116th street and joined one in 109th street, and he likes it ever so much better. They hav a baseball nine at the new church, and only boys who attend there can belong to it. They called the club after Elbridge T. Gerry and the minister went to see Mr. Gerry and got him to giv them a new set of equipments. The boys hav the use of a vacant lot at Fifth avenue and 112th street for themselvs, and none of the other boys can play there. My boy has joined the club, and you don't know how much better he is pleased since he went there to church." Who says the churches are not progressiv?

AT the Universal Peace Congress which lately met in London, G. B., Sir H. de Burgh Lawson, who occupied the chair, said: "I am opposed to opening our sessions with prayer, because the clergy do not attempt to rebuke the national war spirit among our people, and consequently our cause is not, as a rule, aided by them." Commenting on this, a writer in the Workman's Advocate says: "He might hav added that there the dignitaries of the state church even permitted the text of their authorized Bible to be garbled in the ninth command of their God, which is, 'Thou shalt not kill.' In their prayer-book, which is read to the soldiers, it is changed to 'Thou shalt do no murder.' It will readily be perceived that by that clerical thimblerigging the original command is revoked, for in Britain's army and navy 'killing' by command of Victoria or by order of her agents is not ruled to be 'murder.'"

THE power of the Catholic Index Expurgatorius, says the San Francisco Freethought, is shown in the fate of Lilian Leland's book, "A Woman's Journey Around the World." No work by a previously unknown author ever received a more cordial welcome from the press of the country. If editorial commendation could carry a literary venture through to success this one would hav had a tremendous sale. But it seems that the Catholic church has its agents in the headquarters of the News Company at New York. These agents discovered that Lilian Leland had satirized the holy pictures and relics at Rome, and her book was condemned. Not only were all the agencies throughout the country ordered to cease handling it, as soon as this discovery was made, but they were instructed to gather up and return all unsold copies; the result being that a large part of the edition was piled back upon the publisher's hands, and he had to pay express charges on the books returned. The thing was done quietly but effectivly, and we know of no place where "A Woman's Journey Around the World" is for sale except at this office.

MR. BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, president of the Tuskegee Normal School, one of the most competent and cultivated colored men in the country, has just expressed himself thus in the Christian Union: "After coming into direct contact with the colored ministers for eight years in the heart of the South I hav no hesitancy in asserting that three-fourths of the Baptist ministers are unfit, either mentally or morally, or both, to preach the gospel to anyone or to attempt to lead anyone. . . . The character of many of these preachers can be judged by one, of whom it is said that, while he was at work in a cotton field in the middle of July, he suddenly stopped, looked upward, and said, 'O Lord, de work is so hard, de cotton is so grassy, and de sun am so hot, I bleave this darkey am called to preach.' With few exceptions the preaching of the colored ministry is emotional in the highest degree, and the minister considers himself successful in proportion as he is able to set the people in all parts of the congregation to groaning, uttering wild screams, and jumping, finally going into a trance. One of the principal ends sought by most of these ministers is their salary, and to this everything else is made subservient." And the Baptist Leader, the organ of the colored Baptists of Alabama, says: "The greatest object of over two-thirds of the Baptist ministers of Alabama is to collect their salaries. They care no more for the moral and intellectual training of the people than they care for the snap of their finger. They care no more for schools, public enterprises han if there were no such things."

THOMAS STEVENS, a correspondent of the New York World who is now traveling through Russia, writes: "Every mile of the way from Moscow the baleful effect of the vodka has thrust itself into our notice, and we asked our hosts why the Russian priests, like the priests of other countries, didn't exert themselvs in the cause of temperance. The mass of the Russian population are swayed by the sentiments of devotion to the church and its precepts. Two days out of every week, the whole of the seven weeks of Lent, three weeks in June, from the beginning of November till Christmas, or about seven months out of the twelve, the ignorant and reverential moujik starves his long-suffering stomach at the bidding of the church. During all that time he denies himself even eggs and milk, nor deems the conditions of his spiritual well-being hard. But though the church would rebuke him for swallowing a glass of milk in fast time, it says not a word against, but rather encourages, the swallowing of an inordinate quantity of the fiery and biting vodka. 'Why this state of affairs?' we asked. And oh! the devotion of the answer: 'It is bad for the people to drink vodka, but what would the czar do without the taxes on its consumption?' they replied. It was bad for the moujiks to ruin themselvs, but for the sake of the czar all things must be endured. Undoubtedly the lower strata of the Russian population are the drunkenest people under the sun. Looking back over our road, as the thought occurs to me, I remember no village, save Volosovo, in which drunken people were not very much in evidence. At every wayside traklir where we stayed over night the fore part of the night would be more or less of a pandemonium, from the shouting and singing of roystering moujiks filled with vodka. I hav seen gangs of gray-haired old men, Russian prototypes of Si Seth and the rest of them in 'The Old Homestead,' see-sawing, flinging their arms about, and making fools of themselvs generally in the sight of the whole village, yet not attracting to themselvs so much as the curious or reproachful gaze of a single woman. Curious as it may sound to American ears, the Russian priests are notorious boozers. A village priest may get drunk as often as he pleases, and by so doing does not forfeit the respect of his parishioners. It is no uncommon thing, so I am told, for a priest to drink himself into a state of beastly intoxication. And the 'black clergy,' the monks who spin out an indolent existence in the five hundred monasteries of the empire, drink brandy out of beer glasses. But don't imagin that all Russia is shocked at this consumption of spirits by its priesthood—these 'carryings-on' as we should call it. Nothing of the kind. The relations of priest and people in Russia are curious to the Protestant mind. The Russian is devoted to the church, and demands of his priest that he be able to perform the rituals. Whether the priest is of a good moral character or the reverse has no weight with the worshipers. To them he is merely the automatic human machine, a necessary adjunct to the church, to swing the censer and marry them, and say masses for them and bury them. He never attempts to influence their moral character, and they hold him in no sort of respect. As to vodka, if they trouble themselvs about it at all, it is to envy him his ability to purchase enough to get drunk on oftener than they themselvs can afford to. I hav said more about vodka-drinking than I intended to in this paper. The evil of it is so prominently to the fore, however, and the subject so prolific, that when once entered upon it is hard to get away from. That vodka-drinking is at the root of three-fourths of the misery one sees in Russia I am already fully persuaded. The evil is enormous, but the remedy is not so easily found. The revenues are correspondingly enormous, and the universal adoption of temperance by the peasantry would bankrupt the government at once. The revenues from vodka pay the expenses of both army and navy."

Christians, Christianity, Religion.

Had I, some years ago, undertaken to define these terms, I should hav summed them up in a few words; but having, later on—both in a public and private way—witnessed numerous discussions upon Liberal subjects, I find there exists great diversity of opinion, not only among Christians but also among Liberal-minded people, respecting who should and who should not be called Christians. Hence, the reason for this extended treatment of the subject.

The words "Christianity" and "Christian" are, of course, derivations of the name Christ, they having to some extent been pronounced with the long sound of the i. But notwithstanding the fact that every denomination of religious people who hav embraced the doctrins of Christ, hav laid claim to the name Christian, and notwithstanding this fact, also, that each one, in regular order as it came upon the stage of action, sincerely believed that it embraced the sum total of religious truth; yet every successiv faction virtually declared that their predecessors, in the true sense of the term, were not Christians. In discussions where mention has been made of the persecutions participated in by various sects of Christian people, it has been asserted that their religion was not true Christianity, entirely overlooking the fact that Christ himself absolutely taught persecution. The Protestant insists that Catholicism is not Christianity, and the Catholic declares that Protestantism is not Christianity. Universalists are of opinion that Calvinism is not true Christianity, and the Calvinists feel assured that Universalism is not Christianity. The Baptist, too, thinks he approaches more nearly the Christian truth than those of any other creed; the Methodist is quite sure his doctrin is a fulfillment of the actual meaning of Christ's teachings, and the Campbellites are perfectly positiv that they are the only true Christians, while the "Latter Day Saint" is almost paralyzed with wonder because everyone cannot see the true way as he sees it.

On the part of some Liberal thinkers it is claimed that morality, according to the scriptures, is not necessary to salvation; that salvation is dependent alone on faith and worship, and that Christianity, therefore, does not embrace morality, and that those only are Christians who believe in and practice faith and worship.

In view of this diversity in opinions, the questions: Who are Christians, what is Christianity, what are the fundamental principles of the same, and what is religion? are pertinent ones.

Here we should be careful not to switch clear off the main track. Let us be honest and fair. Let us not assert that what they (the Christians) claim as gold is all alloy until we hav given it a scientific test; and, moreover, let us not maintain that the amount of their alloy is greater than their claimed weight of gold.

First. Religion being a system of faith and worship, it is claimed that it may be practiced by a people who do not observe moral precepts. That is true so far as one kind of morality is concerned, but here is a fact which should not be overlooked.

Second. If faith and worship were not regarded as moral, they would not be practiced. If they were regarded as immoral, religion, as an institution for good, could not exist for a day. If faith and worship are not moral they, however, form only a part of Christ's religion, for Christ urged morality with as much zeal as he did faith and worship; therefore morality is as much a part of Christ's religion as faith or worship, and cannot, rightly, be other than a fundamental principle of Christianity. All Christians so understand this, and point with pride to the Golden Rule and other sayings of Christ relativ to morality; or, at least, what they believe to be morality. Then, if we accept the actual teachings of Christ as a basis of Christianity, all of his teachings, whether good or bad—i. e., all which pertain to the welfare of man, or the inculcation of duty to God—form a part of Christianity. In other words, all people who are influenced by the precepts and example of Jesus—whether to make peace or war, it matters not—are followers of Jesus; and if followers of Jesus, they are Christians, and their religion, therefore, Christianity. If religion and morality embody entirely different meanings, as has been alleged, the word "Christianity," nevertheless, binds them into one indissoluble compound. Christ's system of religion contains the three elements—faith, worship, and morality. The prescription reads thus: Faith, 1 part; worship, 1 part; morality, 1 part. Should we leave out either one of these ingredients, then, in a strict sense, we hav no Christianity. And be it observed in this connection, that a very large proportion of the drug "morality" placed on the market by Jesus, is impure and poisonous, but since it is his medicin, it cannot by any means be left out of the prescription, even though when taken it produces a moral blight among the people. If the prescription is to be filled at all, let it be compounded from the medicin Jesus left in stock. Here is some of it: "Take no thought for the morrow." "A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven." "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." "But these mine enemies which would not that I should rule over them, bring hither and slay them before me."

These, with the embodied biblical declaration that angels, yes, heavenly angels, are to engage in gathering together and burning up wicked human beings—delightful, rapturous doctrin!—these, I repeat, with many other immoral teachings of Christ, constitute no small part of the system called Christianity.

Yet, although the doctrins of heavenly bliss and eternal pain are fundamental principles of Christianity, they are not more so than the principle, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you," nor more so than many of the immoral principles which came directly from Jesus.

Christ evidently intended many of his teachings as moral, the outcome of which are decidedly immoral, but the Christian is blinded and deluded to such an extent that he deems the author of these very teachings a model of wisdom and goodness.

But whatever is of Christ's teachings relativ to duty toward God or man, is of his religion, and whatever is a part of his religion—as above stated—must necessarily be a part of Christianity. And again, whatever of his teachings, whether good or bad—if followed and embodied into a religion by those who accept him as the teacher of morals—can not be other then constituent elements of Christianity, and therefore those creeds the advocates of which hav, and do, indulge in persecutions on the strength of Christ's teachings favoring persecution, are undeniably Christians and their religion true Christianity.

If we accept Christ as divine, his teachings of course form the basis of his religion. If we accept him as a moral teacher only, they are in the same sense the foundation of his religion, and therefore the bulwark of Christianity.

It matters not so far as the religion of Christianity is concerned, whether Christ was God or man; whether the Holy Ghost was his father; whether he was crucified between two thieves, or whether he actually arose from the dead. The truth or falsity of these early Christian assumptions has no direct bearing on the subject. The question concerns the religion of Christ, or his teachings relativ to salvation, and to the moral good of mankind. Whether morality is essential to salvation or not, Christ must hav so regarded it, or at least, he considered it an indispensable auxiliary to the proper exercise of faith and worship, else why did he teach morality? Morality consists of virtue, works, conduct. "For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also" (James ii, 26). We should apply the same rule of criticism to "faith" and "worship" as to the Golden Rule, or to any moral or immoral utterance of Jesus. Indeed, every saying of Jesus, whether appertaining to religion, faith, and worship, or morality, should be tested by the veritable laws of ethics. The name "Christianity," then, involves the consideration of the moral and immoral teachings of Jesus—this and nothing more. The name "religion" bespeaks duty to God for the good of man, and as religion is either right or wrong, it is moral or immoral, and we hav no means of deciding upon the virtue of a teaching except through its effect upon humanity, and this must be determined by the science of ethics. Religion, however, is not confined strictly to faith and worship, it possesses an etymological meaning (to bind together), yet it has been asserted that the supernatural is by far the greater part; but this is not true, for every good work of all Christians in every Christian country is due to religion in its etymological and ethical sense, and the good works of Christians are by no means an insignificant part of their religion. Let us giv the devil his due! Let us understand the true situation! Is there any gold dust adhering to the rock, that vaunted foundation of Christianity—let the devotees hav every grain.

The "supernatural" is the dangerous element of religion. It is the quicksand of the emotions. It is fickle. It has no foundation in fact, and for these reasons death and desolation must ever follow in its wake. And especially is this true of the supernaturalism of the Bible.

Revealed religion, Bible religion, the religion of the New Testament, is immoral. It is immoral because it teaches the recognition of an imaginary authority superior to the enlightened reason of man. It is immoral because man has been misguided by these teachings and led to torture his fellow-brother. This is a natural result of true Bible religion, and very much of what may properly be termed Bible morality produces the same effect. Now, if that which is taught as religion produces an excess on the side of unhappiness, it is immoral; if the balance favors the side of happiness, allowing this to be possible, it would prove the morality of the religion. Then, too, if that which is taught as morality produces an excess of unhappiness, beyond its equilibrium of happiness, it is immoral; but if a surplus of happiness is produced, it is because the teaching is moral. From this it is plain that that which is denominated religion, even in a supernatural sense, is susceptible to the moral test, and if we can weigh it in the moral scales, it must be akin to morality. We cannot test philology by mathematics, nor botany by metaphysics; neither could we test religion by morality if they were, as is claimed, entirely separate from each other. The tendency in either case is toward morality or immorality. If religion be an evil, the only way to prove it is by ethical science.

Here is another point. Christ taught faith and worship because he believed it right to do so, and if he regarded their promulgation as right, he, of course, taught them in a moral sense. Hence, they are not immoral because of the names "faith" and "worship," but because of some ill effect to society as a sequence of their observance. Religion, in a supernatural sense, even, was inaugurated for the purpose of benefiting the human race. It is taught for that purpose now. Who will deny this? If these assertions be true, then it is not the idea which is immoral; neither is it the purpose; nor yet the name. It is simply the misconceptions of the real, and natural, basis of right and wrong in connection with the practice of false conceptions respecting the supernatural idea, which are, in a legitimate sense, immoral.

If belief in the supernatural were stripped of all arbitrary infinit authority as a guiding agent toward actions of right, it could not possibly hav a decided immoral effect.

There is, also, claim made by some, that if Jesus is not divine, or if the Bible is proved false respecting the doctrin of hell, the whole Christian system falls to the ground.

To this we reply—only the supernatural will fall. Christ may and will stand as a moral teacher, providing his teachings are sufficiently good to sustain him, and to fill the requirements of a growing enlightenment. Christ himself did not claim to be divine; but we think he believed in hell. We are led to this conclusion by references which were occasionally made by him respecting that more than temperate climate. He did not, however, speak of hell as an originator setting forth a belief unknown to the world. He spoke of it in the light of a foregone conclusion that such a place really existed, and that the people even then entertained such belief.

Here, again, it should not be forgotten that the "faith" and "worship" part of Christ's religion or any other religion is antecedent to all records, either of stone or parchment. This kind of religion—to hav faith in and worship God—was, as every thinker knows, born of ignorance and was old before the advent of Christ into the world. Christ, then, did not create religion; neither did Buddha, Mohammed, or Confucius. It existed prior to their time and was handed down from generation to generation until it reached, in turn, Buddha, Confucius, Jesus, Mohammed, and we might add Smith, Swedenborg, and last of all Schweinfurth. Each of these embraced the same fundamental principles, the same religion of faith, worship, and moral precept, differing only in the construction of their several systems, in their rites and ceremonies, and in some of the minor details. Worship and morality are fundamental principles in all. In the time of Christ the fall of man was an established belief—he was to be forever lost. This suggested the atonement, the divine scheme (?) of salvation, and upon this ground the various saviors of the world hav appeared and preached and suffered and died, each one claiming to be the true savior of mankind and each one promising eternal life to all who believed in him and obeyed his commandments.

Jesus appears in the list with many others and promises eternal life and complete absolution from sin to all who accept him as the one and only true mediator between God and man. Man, it should be remembered, was predestined to be lost. Christ had nothing whatever to do with establishing that pertinent truth (?); his religion was, substantially, to prepare his followers for escaping the direful calamity which was to befall them, and therefore does not consist in teaching directly that lost state which it is said awaits the unbeliever when done with this life, or that which it is said awaited the entire world without a savior. It is evident from the teachings of Christ that he accepted the prevalent theories of his time concerning the existence of God, the creation, fall of man, etc, and his religion was that, or at least was intended to be that, which would induce the race of man to escape the predestined consequences of the wrath of God without an intercessor or that which was to be the dismal fate of original sin. From these facts it would seem that the passage, "He that believeth not shall be damned," in the light of predestination is no part of Christ's religion—it is a part of the teachings imputed to him—a part of Christianity, but not of his religion. This passage inculcates cruelty, and cruelty does not conform to religion in its legitimate sense. There is nothing cruel in faith, neither is there in voluntary worship, nor yet in loving God or obeying any reasonable commands. Hence, religion, per se, is not and was not intended by God or conscientious man to be cruel. Cruelty, in truth, is a product of existing religions, but the fault is not in the true meaning of that term, but in the foundation upon which the religion rests.

It is the Bible. This book of holy writ basely grants a license to persecute. It also encourages malice, envy, hatred, and strife. But tell me, what do we find in the most comprehensiv meaning of the term religion, which indicates cruelty in any sense whatever? Nothing, simply nothing! We cannot torture the word into any such meaning; neither can we the word morality. Yet many things hav been taught as moral precepts which hav resulted in pain and death to the people, and although this is true, we cannot justly lay the blame to morality. Then, neither can we blame religion alone, for the evil which emanates from Christianity. The desolation lurks in the intolerant, debasing, polluted, and monstrous teachings, which, on account of ignorance and corrupt natures, hav been woven into both religion and morality, there to remain, a moral poison, the effect of which is "man's inhumanity to man." We favor eradicating every vestige of evil from both our popular religion and prevailing morality; and if religion in its supernatural sense contains no redeeming quality whatever, then, we say, let it perish; but we should not vigorously condemn a term which bears no significant evil meaning.

I am not, however, in favor of the word except in a phonetic sense.

It is a beautiful word, but "religion" will ever bear with it unpleasant memories. Its phonetic tones will ever unfold scenes of cruel torture—will ever cause to be painted upon the canvas of the mind pictures of the mangled dead.

The word should become obsolete.

The ultimatum of Christ's religion is to induce men to fulfill certain requirements that they may escape future punishment and be fitted to enjoy eternal bliss in heaven.

Belief, of course, is one of the essential requisits. To believe in and observe his teachings is all-sufficient, but even this, it will be noticed, was taught in a moral sense—could be taught in no other.

Christ believed it was right, and in accord with beneficence, that a way to escape the consequences of original sin be provided; he believed it right that he assume the mediatorship between God and man. He believed it right to encourage faith, and inculcate worship.

Therefore, these were both taught in a moral sense, and as principles of religion they cannot be separated from the moral teachings of Christ.

The qualities which hav robed the affections in the drapery of despair are not pure religion, but immorality.

Religion and morality are so interwoven with immoral teachings that the former must ever bear the stigma of the latter. From the very nature and meaning of the word, the religion of Christ cannot possibly consist of any teaching not intended by him to benefit the race of man.

If he really taught the doctrin of hell, he could not in reason hav intended it as a doctrin for the religious good of humanity either in this life, or the life which he proclaimed continues beyond this vale of tears, because a hell could not be for the genuin good of any human being. And a belief that punishment will be inflicted cannot inspire a feeling of duty toward the inflicter. But believing in future punishment, or hell, he referred to it as a place to be inhabited only in consequence of a non-fulfillment of the religious teachings set forth by him. If he did not believe in future punishment, yet encouraged moral action through fear of hell, he is a hypocrit. We prefer to think that Christ taught future punishment because he so believed, and that he referred to it as a penalty for sin, and not as a part of his religion.

Had the so-called lost state of man not been predicated, and had Jesus been the first to advance such a doctrin, then it might in justice be termed his, or at least a part of his religion. Again, if he taught hell fire at all, he taught it in a moral sense. To illustrate—I may say to an ignorant person: "If you violate that law you will be arrested, fined, and imprisoned." I impart the information because I wish to save him this fate, and not because I am a lawgiver, or that I justify the punishment. This is morality. Christ said: "If you believe not, you shall be damned." The desire to save his people from the fate of being punished brings this declaration within the domain of the moral. There is no religion whatever in the act of inculcating this doctrin; but, nevertheless, it is a part of the Christian system, and as God is the being who is to inflict the punishment on those who do not accept the teachings of Christ, we find this doctrin inseparably linked to the supernatural, hence the gospel for the infliction of pain is a supernatural, or immoral part of Christianity. But the inherent motiv on the part of the teacher, to incite men to be good, or to attain specific ends, is a moral one, and the very existence of the imaginary actuality of this immoral belief excites, or augments the tendencies of the masses toward doing good, which per se is moral. In a different light still, it is certainly unnecessary for man through the agencies of a supernatural religion to assign innumerable absurdities to an imaginary being, or even to accept imputed supernatural authority when it is known to be cruel and contrary to reason. The word religion does not mean authority of God over man; it means duty of man to God without the implication of any consequences whatever as a sequence of the assumed duty not being recognized.

The consequences hav been thrown in for a vile purpose. Religion, of course, is the natural outgrowth—under certain laws and conditions—of the emotional nature of man, or more correctly speaking, it is an outgrowth of fear and is sustained by the influence, or through the influence, of the emotions. Now, if we can find no trace of evil in the constituent elements of mind which participate in religion, we must then look for some particular cause outside of the natural functions of these elements for the widespread evils which in the name of religion hav afflicted the people. The religious and moral elements are veneration, conscientiousness, hope, spirituality, and benevolence—neither one of which bears any relation whatever to cruelty or injustice. They hav the opposit tendency, and if cruelty ever emanates therefrom, it is because the desire to do what is believed to be right is greater than human sympathy. It is because the judgment is in error, and because people entertain the foolish belief that under some circumstances God approves of, and even requires, the infliction of pain. And it is a historical fact, too, that the greater the honesty and sincerity of believers, the more pain they will inflict.

The foregoing reveals a pertinent truth, that a faculty the natural tendency of which is toward good may be instrumental in the performance of evil deeds; but in such case, the mind, even in its entirety, does not realize that the deeds are evil. Hence, ignorance is the cause—education the remedy. Again, the name "religion" does not imply a needed cruelty on the part of God. It implies obedience; but the meaning or nature of religion does not call for that obedience which would cause the death of innumerable people. The name also implies worship, but although degrading, there is nothing in the meaning of the term which implies persecution either in this world or the world to come, as a consequence of the non-fulfillment of this requirement. It is ignorance. It is false belief nurtured into life by motivs for accomplishing corrupt ends, and then woven into religion until it has become an inseparable part of it. It is this, through the medium of religion, which has proved so disastrous to the human race.

For this reason I would not concede for a moment that religion in a supernatural sense is not objectionable; nay, it has been the scourge of mankind, and it will ever prove a curse to the world, just so long as the imagination of man puts words of authority into the imaginary mouth of an imaginary being. Herein is the embryo of all religious immoralities.

The supernatural admits of no definit basis from which to reason; in fact, it chokes the breath right out of reason. This is the solution. It is useless for reason to go in search of knowledge, because religion already knows! It knows because imaginary words hav been put into the mouth of an imaginary God, and when anything is positivly known, investigation is needless. When God asserts a thing it is the grand fiat of eternal truth—so thinks the Christian. For this reason religion is stationary. It is stationary because more than two thousand years ago man emptied his entire stock of wisdom into a weird, phantasmic infinit body! (?)—an imaginary God—and then turned right about and said that this fountain of wisdom had always existed; that it was infinit, and that he (man) absorbed what little he knew from this exhaustless store of knowledge. This being the wisdom which was to regale the coming man, which was preordained to warm the cockles of his heart in times of tribulation and rare distress, we can readily understand why religion is stationary. The stop cock of this fountain has been turned on for eighteen hundred years, the same stale wisdom continues to flow, and they who drink pretend that it is just a little cleaner and sweeter than the enlightened wisdom of to-day. Again, religion is stationary because it is supposed to come from God. God is supposed to be perfect. Perfect God makes perfect Bible. Perfect Bible makes perfect religion. Perfect religion needs no change.

Prehistoric truth boiled down, and still palatable in the nineteenth century! The reasoning is good and the argument conclusiv upon its hypothetical basis, but it is strongly suggestiv of a meager allowance of brain tissue, and is about on a par with—Big Injun! much mystery! man not wise! great spirit heap smart! ugh!

I hav no use for any of the prevalent religions, because they deal with assumptions and not with facts. Morality will satisfy every essential requisit for the happiness and perpetuity of the race—it builds upon a physical basis. I hav no ethical use for religion, because it has no fixed basis of right; because in its supernatural sense it abdicates reason; because it accepts emotional impressions as truths; because it rejects a natural foundation, and because from the sequence of these truisms the progress of the world has been hindered and the human race made wretched and miserable. Science is able to cast off the rubbish because reason is permitted to determin, and conscience to assert, what the rubbish is. Not so with religion. It is just what the morbid imagination and pueril common sense of primitiv man made it. It has undergone slight modification, of course, but the very act of modifying is an insult to an omnipotent author. Religion, in a supernatural sense, is just what the imagination of man has made it, and the more erratic the imagination the more fantastic and nonsensical the religion. From the foregoing, it will be seen that religion cannot be entirely separated from morality, i.e., religion as it would be if in keeping with the nature and meaning of the word. But religion as it is, with its multiplicity of evils such as now form the body of Christianity, is to a great extent the very opposit of morality. It must not be forgotten, however, that religion in its etymological sense is practiced, and with good effect, too, by Christian people. Christianity embraces the supernatural, the etymological, and ethical; but without regard to terms the Christian mixes these all together and calls the compound religion. The correct name is Christianity.

The question arises here: Is it necessary to fulfill every teaching and obey every mandate of Christ in order to be a Christian? We answer, no; decidedly no. If this be required, then there is not a Christian on earth; for many of Christ's teachings are contrary to nature and cannot, in a general sense, be fulfilled. If such a rule was recognized by the adherents of our political, social, and industrial institutions, thousands of men would be deprived of a party name, because, from a diversity in mental aptitudes, it is impossible that any political, social, moral, or religious teacher be followed by everyone to the very letter, even though the fulfillment of the teaching is within the bounds of a possibility.

From this it is plain that if the cardinal principles be admitted, and the doctrins of a reformer be regarded by a sect or class as the nearest approach to a definit standard of truth, then, whether his every teaching be universally accepted or not, if sufficient be embodied to form a creed, the adherents of this creed may justly bear the name of the preceptor, or the religion, or doctrin, set forth by him. An individual may embrace Spiritualism, be a Spiritualist, and yet not believe in materialization as taught by many of the leading Spiritualists of the day. Again, the teachings of Christ may be and are accepted by many people in a moral sense only. The Unitarians accept him as a moral teacher, but not as divine. In either case, humanity may profit by his moral instructions, and in either case the world may suffer by his immoral teachings.

The Unitarians sail under the suggestiv appellation "Christian" because they accept Christ as a moral teacher, and not because they believe him divine. The names "Christian" and "Christianity" accord with both moral and religious practices, although devoid of a strict compliance with every teaching of Christ.

Thousands of Democrats hav voted the Democratic ticket who did not indorse every part of the Democratic platform. There are, to-day, many Prohibitionists who do not indorse every method for curing the rum curse advocated and practiced by leading temperance people.

So with the creeds of Christendom.

The Universalist is a Christian, even though he does not believe in eternal pain. The Calvinist is a Christian, although he believes in infant damnation. So the Catholic, the Campbellite, the Latter Day Saint, and all others of the Christian creeds—they are all Christians. They may differ as to what they accept, and also as to what they reject, yet, as they are governed by Christ's teachings, they are Christians and their religion Christianity.

Then, as to what Christianity really is, there is but one answer: The good and bad precepts, or the moral and immoral teachings, of Christ, which hav been and are embodied in the creeds of Christendom or set forth in the gospels of the New Testament. In respect to who may properly be called Christians, we answer: Every individual, or sect, or people, whose conduct is shaped by these teachings. We believe according to our ability to grasp a truth, or a supposed truth; we practice according to the quantity embraced. Beyond this we cannot go.

An individual may be a mathematician and yet not comprehend every principle of mathematics. A mild temper may be accorded although the mind is not always tranquil. One may be generous and yet not giv to every object of charity. And likewise an individual may rightly be termed a Christian if he practice either the good or evil teachings of Christ.

Did one believe in the divinity of Jesus, and yet regard all the teachings imputed to him as spurious, he could not be a Christian, because there would be no cause for action, and action of some kind is positivly the factor needed. According to Webster Christianity is the religion taught by Christ. A Christian is a disciple of Christ, a disciple is a follower, and to be a follower is to imitate the one to be followed. This denotes action, and to imitate action calls for action on the part of the imitator.

This proves that mere belief does not constitute one a Christian, and that they only are Christians who practice the teachings of Christ, or who, as an acknowledgment of the cause of Christianity, participate in some kind of mental action. Further, acts are directed by two classes of motivs—that which incites to the practice of original thought or precepts, and that which incites to the practice of thoughts and precepts set forth by others, and as action implies the existence of some rule of conduct to be followed, if such rule be a teaching—and it cannot be otherwise—then it is the practice of Christ's teachings which constitutes Christianity, and not the mere belief in the divinity of Jesus.

A man who believes in the divinity of Jesus, and believes also that virtuous conduct and all rules of right taught by Christ should be observed, yet if so constituted that he will not follow any of the good teachings of Christ, can we rightfully call him a Christian? We answer no, unless it be a fact that his evil doings were prompted by the teachings of Christ, in which case he would be a Christian.

Again, if one disbelieve in faith and worship, and disbelieve also in the divinity of Jesus, yet if he accepts the moral precepts of Christ as his standard of excellence and follows the same he is undeniably a Christian. On the other hand, if he accept, in a practical sense, the teachings of Christ relativ to faith and worship, entirely disregarding, and if possible disbelieving in, the Golden Rule, together with all kind and benevolent teachings, he is still a Christian.

Ten to One.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A young lawyer a few weeks ago remarked to me in his office, "I am with you in sentiment, but I dare not take any activ part in the movement. I am just getting a start, and it would ruin me in my profession. I confess I am a moral coward." He then gleefully quoted Colonel Ingersoll's advice, "If your children are likely to suffer for bread by an open declaration of your principles keep quiet. I will do the talking for you."

I hardly think the colonel said it in just that way, but I remember something like it, uttered by him in a jocose way; at least I accepted it as a clever bit of irony.

The Catholics claim from eight to ten millions, Protestants from nineteen to forty millions; but Liberals hav ten times as many as both together. I devoutly wish I could find them in my travels.

Looking for Liberals in some towns is akin to hunting for the celebrated needle in the historic haystack. If Liberals are as numerous as this, then it is my opinion that there is not enough stamina in Liberals to save this republic. If Liberals outnumber the church people ten to one I despair of the Liberal movement. The damp of death is on its brow. I supposed that Liberalism tended to make a man of one; fearless, bold, outspoken, candid, and courageous, as ready to rebuke an error in his own brother as in an implacable foe.

That glorious man and live Liberal, J. D. Shaw, said in his Independent Pulpit:

> It is a sad commentary upon the candor and intellectual honesty of our times when we are forced to believe that there are in fact about ten Infidels—unbelievers—to every Christian believer, in this state.

From this it will be seen that Brother Shaw also strikes ten. But he throws considerable light upon the matter by adding, "And yet not one out of every one hundred of these Infidels is a Liberal." Just so! If there were no more than five millions of Christians in this country, there ought to be, according to Westbrook, Mende, and Craddock, fifty millions of Liberals. But according to Shaw, you cannot depend upon them, not one in a hundred. This shrivels the number to half a million. Hav we that many? A quarter of a dollar from each Liberal once a year, would send the gospel of Liberalism into every neighborhood in the United States. Are there eighty public lecturers within our borders? It is estimated that there are eighty thousand preachers, a thousand preachers to one Liberal lecturer; that is, one Christian does more than ten Liberals, a thousand to one, for the support of public meetings, than which nothing better has been devised for coming near to the people.

When one of our religious opponents declares that Christianity has come to stay, while Liberalism is evanescent, and cites in corroboration what the parties do respectivly for the support of their ideas, it is not easy to convince a popular audience that he is not right. This latest utterance by President Westbrook and friends, that "Liberals hav been hitherto but a rope of sand wherever public coöperation has been concerned," clinches the matter in the Christian's mind, that Liberalism does not hav the confidence of the people, while Christianity, with all its absurdities, inconsistencies, and immoralities, is a popular and permanent institution. Aye, the Christian goes farther, and makes capital out of the fact that Liberals themselvs hav no confidence in their own system, and instances in proof that Liberals help support the churches, pay money to build them, and send their children to Sunday-schools, where they are taught that Infidels are a dangerous class of people, lacking in intelligence and good morals.

Children naturally love the approbation of their mates, and do not want to be considered Infidel, consequently hosts of children of Freethought parents end in joining the church, after which they are, so to speak, lionized by their Christian associates. Christians understand the art of flattery to perfection. Why should the children be censured? Their elders set them that example. All fathers and mothers that say, "It will not do for us to take any public action in favor of Liberalism; it will injure our business and cut us off from society," virtually teach their children to practice hypocrisy. This is severe, I admit, but it is true.

Those Liberals who stay out of the church to save pew-rent; who never do any thing to advance their own principles; who never pay a dollar toward a course of Freethought lectures in their town; never subscribe for a Liberal paper, are do-nothing Liberals. Is this the material of which Judge Westbrook's Liberal army is composed? I do not see how he can get ten Liberals to one of the church party by leaving them out. Is it not bad generalship to overrate our numbers, and doubly so to underrate those of our enemy? Are we justifiable in counting people Liberals who are not willing to stand up and be counted for Liberalism as valiantly, at least, as Christians stand up for Jesus? How can any man or woman, convinced that Liberalism is true, giv it a sickly, half-hearted support?

Let us quit counting our millions and organize our Spartan thousands into one body of brave men and noble women who are not afraid of the frown of the church, nor of their neighbors. We had better count only those who hav the grand courage of conviction. A smaller army of the right stuff is what we need. Let these few thousands throughout the United States unite to strengthen the Secular Union. Let them furnish not only good will and lots of influence, but a good supply of money, so that the Secular Union can send good, willing workers into the whole country. Let the Liberals resolve at once to begin raising funds, and put $100,000 into the hands of our Secular Union officers, and place every lecturer on a salary of $1,000 a year and actual traveling expenses, the lecturer to solicit funds for the Union. This is a very small salary for professional people. But small as it is, a single year's trial would make Christian superstition shake from turret to foundation.

I will write one more letter on this subject, entitled, "How Shall we Do?" W. F. JAMIESON.

Des Moines, Ia.

"What Are We Doing?"

While following the course of our daily avocations we naturally come in contact with persons of Liberal tendencies, and usually a conversation upon Liberal topics will ensue, but when we narrow down our issues to practicality, and ask them if they would join some Liberal organization or subscribe to a Liberal paper, we almost invariably meet with this rejoinder, "What are you doing?" Secularists, turn here and ask yourselvs the question, "What are we doing?" and what will your answer be? What must it be? Now I hav frequently expressed my regret, both upon the platform and in THE TRUTH SEEKER, at the apathetic attitude of Secularists throughout the United States, and again I would urge upon them this simple fact, Apathy is the curse of our party. And to day many professing Secularists seek not so much to be instructed, but only to be amused. One great evil which the Secular party are subject to is that as soon as a person becomes a Freethinker, his mind naturally turns toward the solving of Socialistic or Anarchistic problems, and perhaps, having solved them to something like his own satisfaction he thinks he has a right to thrust them upon the great mass of Freethinkers whether they would hav them or not. And if no one can be found to giv him a willing ear, he at once deserts the old party which has made it possible for all others to exist, in search of greener fields and pastures new. All this has a tendency to bring within our ranks side issues, which result in the formation of party factions who are continually fighting against each other instead of uniting themselvs to fight the common foe. Under such conditions as these it is scarcely a matter of surprise that hardly any perceptible improvement in our party is accomplished. I sometimes find myself almost giving way to despair when I see the utter disinterestedness, the utter indifference of many professing Freethinkers, and this indifference seems all the more deplorable to me when I see around us on every hand these ghastly religious systems, who amidst their gaudy wealth and ceaseless ostentations stand as a stumbling-block to science and a bar to social progress, and whose half-paralyzed limbs, galvanized into a spasmodic and unnatural activity, stand as a menace to all our workers and reformers. Secularists, why will you not rouse yourselvs from this state of quiescence, from your apparent slumbers, and awake stimulated to activ perseverance by the consciousness that posterity will do us that justice which is denied us now? Secularism is apathetic just now, and some Secularists seem to be satisfied with the work that has been already accomplished, and while Secularists are indulging in listless apathy, the superstitious are by no means idle, for they are to-day exerting themselvs with redoubled vigor; to prove this we hav only to observe the popularity of such shallow-brained individuals as Dr. Talmage, and is it not a deplorable fact that places cannot be found large enough to contain the thousands who flock to hear their abominable trash?

It is indeed a truth that the time has now come when we, as a party, should adopt a systematic propaganda. At present we hav none, and it does seem to me a source of regret that no distinct plan of organized action has been pursued by Liberals, as a union, in the United States. Meanwhile are there not ample and energetic preparations made for the spreading of superstition? But what means do we possess for spreading truth? Hav we as good means for propagating truth as our opponents hav for propagating error? Nay, but I would ask, hav we any? And, alas, the answer must be, no, we hav no system. Now, just as in a battle-field, so in intellectual contests we must hav disciplin and perseverance, and this will surely triumph over any undisciplined body, however large their numbers or brave their courage, however great their prowess or heroic the exertions of the individuals composing this disorganized mass. If any proof of this is required it may be found in the simple fact that the exertions of individual lecturers thoughout the country are productiv of more good to the cause of Freethought than the whole labors of the American Secular Union. And it is a fact to be deplored that while many men of ability are willing to come forward on our side the national organization does not seem capable of utilizing their services so as to be of any real good to itself. And this is the policy that the Union must follow, unless, as we are told by one of its officers, "it must go to the wall." To prevent this the Union must follow out the course I hav suggested—a systematic propaganda. And until this is done we shall hav spurts of zeal and dashes of daring, but no steady, continuous efforts, such as will secure us the victory. For, after all, the lecturer is the real worker, he is the real soldier, for upon him falls the brunt of the battle. There are outside the pale of the Union men of strength, courage, and ability, who are ready and willing to take up our standard. But, if we would hav good teachers, we must pay them. If we would hav them true to us, we must be true to them. Now, with such men as these, and above all, a judicious organization, our triumph is certain.

Freethought is languishing to-day in the United States for the want of such an organization. The American Secular Union, as at present constituted, does not exercise one tithe of the legitimate influence on society that it ought to do and might do did we but present an united front to the enemy. For to shatter the stolid and unreasonable creeds is the great work for it to do for some time to come. The Union must not go to the wall. Something must be done to save and to build up the national organization. And that must be done decisivly and in earnest. But perhaps more can be done, by way of reform, inside the Union than outside. In the first place, they must insist upon the removal of that clause in the constitution, adopted at the last congress in Philadelphia, which is so obnoxious to many of the best supporters of the Union—namely, that which admits persons of all opinions into our ranks upon the simple basis of the separation of church and state. I hav pointed out upon a previous occasion the utter fallacy of adopting a policy of this kind; indeed, it is not sufficient even to unite all classes of Liberals upon. Besides, the real evil lies here—Christians and Freethinkers cannot, and will not, work together in harness, for the good of the one is the profoundest evil of the other. In the next place, the Union must endeavor to promote some sort of a systematic propaganda throughout the country, enlist the lecturers in our ranks, so as to utilize their genius to the interests of the Union. When they do this, and the rank and file of the party can be sure that the officials are composed of earnest workers, subscriptions will flow into the coffers of the Union from the length and breadth of the land, to enable them to carry on the good work, and that work must needs be for some time yet an aggressiv, destructiv, iconoclastic work. We must seek the storm, and be prepared to meet with opposition the encroachments of ecclesiasticism. We need not take a crooked and tortuous route, when a broad and glorious path is before us. Let us carry on the guerilla warfare, but we can only do it by union, order, regulation, and disciplin. Let us rescue our principle from the unmerited sneers of its enemies, and show them that it is a power, and not a mere sound. But this can only be done by one method, and that I earnestly urge upon all Freethinkers. Unite. Unite. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

God in the Constitution, and Preachers in Office.

It is claimed by Christians that all of morality, progress, and prosperity is due to Christianity. If Bible and Christianity are such sure barriers against vice, such great promoters of good, then it is only necessary to elect none but preachers to office, make our spiritual guides our temporal rulers, and we make the United States one perfect paradise. But facts are stubborn things, and will not bend to sanction our faith or prejudice. The following editorial on "Preachers and Politics" is from the issue of Aug. 14, 1890, of the Post-Intelligencer, of Seattle, Wash., the leading Republican newspaper of the state, and always the friend and advocate of Christianity:

The pending political contest in Arkansas has brought the clergy to the front to an extent never before approached in any other state of the Union, not even excepting the good old times of blue laws and Puritan rule in New England. In Arkansas the two leading parties seem to hav vied with each other in the struggle for clerical candidates. On the Democratic state ticket are Rev. J. P. Eagle, Rev. W. S. Dunlop, Rev. R B. Morrow, Rev. W. E. Atkinson, Rev. J. H. Shinn, Rev. M. H. Sandels, and Rev. M. F. Locke, with only two sinners, B. B. Chism and C. B. Myers, sandwiched in for the sake of piquancy.

The Union Labor ticket, indorsed by the Republicans, contains the names of Rev. N. B. Fizer, Rev. O. S. Jones, Rev. T. J. Andrews, Rev. T. M. C. Birmingham, Rev. C. M. B. Cox. Rev. G. B. Farmer, and Rev. W. R Coody, seven ministers, and, as in the other case, two of the irreverend, J. M. Pittman and T. P. Chambers, for the sake of variety.

It has long been a moot question whether the activ participation of preachers in politics, especially as candidates for office, were more likely to hav a purifying effect on politics, or a corrupting effect on the preachers. If the Little Rock Christian, an influential religious organ of that state and section, is to be credited, politics has been decidedly the stronger force in Arkansas.

That paper uses very strong language. "In all seriousness," it declares, "the churches of Arkansas are responsible for the corruption in her politics. The churches of Little Rock are responsible for every house of ill-fame, every saloon, and every gambling-hell in the city." The preachers and members of the churches, it intimates, are so anxious and activ in working for votes that they shut their eyes to the evils which exist all around them, lest by assailing them they should excite the opposition at the polls of those who are engaged in them. And as a natural and inevitable result of the immunity thus obtained these social cancers are multiplying frightfully.

It is not believed, however, that every preacher who should become a candidate for office would to the extent above reported allow his moral sense and duty as a citizen to be so completely blunted. But beyond doubt their participation in activ and imbittered politics, especially as seekers for office, to the extent that it has been carried in Arkansas or to any considerable extent, must lessen the general respect for their sacred calling, and impair their influence. The result must be hurtful to the cause to which they are consecrated.

It is believed that except in rare cases of special fitness, and to meet an emergency, it were better that ministers should abstain from running for political offices, and in the exceptional cases which demand their candidacy it would be better that they at least temporarily abstain from ministerial duties. Rightfully or wrongfully, in public estimation preaching and candidacy for political office do not seem to mix well.

If Bible-reading, daily prayers, hymn-singing, weekly preaching, and close communion with God so utterly fails to preserve from vice and immorality the preachers, how can it be hoped the Sunday church services can insure the virtue of the laity? Has not Christianity proved an utter failure? Is it not full time to try a better and more practical code? Do right from love of right, because you thus insure the best interests and happiness of all around you—not from fear of hell or hope of reward. Liv lives of purity and benevolence, making your own heaven here and now, and thus avoid all need of vicarious atonement, saviors, popes, priests, preachers, or churches. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Catholic Skepticism in France.

In "Numa Roumestan," a realist novel of great merit by Alphonse Daudet, the attitude of personages occupying high political or judicial positions suggests interesting reflections. The passages following exhibit also contrasts between the skepticism of intellectual Parisians and passionate Provencaux, representing the southern race of France, then the bigotry of peasants in the south. Numa and his wife a few months after their marriage are conversing:

Roumestan had the religion of his province; a Provençal who goes to mass about the end of it, stands near the door by the holy water with the air of papa at a child's show; never confesses, unless in a cholera season, but would endure martyrdom for a faith he does not feel and which does not check his passions nor his vices. He had taken his wife for a Catholic, and the curate of St. Paul, in his discourse upon their wedding, had an unction in proportion to the wax lights, the carpets and bouquets, of a high life ceremonial. The ladies of his circle were all fervent Catholics. Rosalie's indifference surprised him.

"Do you never go to confession?" he asked.

"No, my friend, nor you either; that I see."

"Oh! as for me it is different."

"Why so?"

And her bright eyes expressed a surprise so sincere, so unconscious of her feminin inferiority, that he found no answer and allowed her to explain herself. Oh, she had no pretension to being a strong-minded person, a Freethinker. Up to her seventeenth year, at boarding-school and after, she had observed the rites of the church with her mother, a devout Provençal; then one day something broke out in her and she declared to her parents an insurmountable aversion for the confessional. Her mother sought to overrule this, but her father interposed.

"Let her be; that is the way it was with me just about her age."

Parisian, of fashionable society, and eschewing independences of bad taste, if Numa wished to go to church, she would accompany him, but without consenting to falsehood, to the grimaces of a belief she no longer entertained.

He listened in amazement at this energetic self-assertion, which put to rout his southern ideas about feminin dependence.

"You do not, then, believe in God?" he asked, pointing upward with oratorical unction.

She answered with such candid spontaneity that it was like an Infidel's profession of faith:

"Is he possible?"

Much less exercised about the possibility of God than his conventionality, the politician fell back upon the solidarity of religion with the monarchy. Those ladies—the duchess, Madam D'Escarbes—all confessed, and received their confessor at home in the evening. It would hav a bad effect were it known that——

Here he broke down. For two or three Sundays after, he attended his wife to mass, but this effort exhausted his piety. He pleaded business, and ceased all further Catholic manifestations—i.e., in his personal behavior—though, as a politician in office, he continued to espouse, on all occasions, the interests of the church against the Freethinkers. Madam Roumestan is not merely submissiv in this conduct. She and her father, a chief magistrate, are, as well as Roumestan, of the monarchist party, and the cause of Henry V. is identified with Catholicity.

Hence, though both daughter and father are types of conscientiousness, they side with the church in externals. This is conspicuous in the baptism of a baby Roumestan, where the skeptic magistrate stands godfather, with the devout Catholic aunt as godmother, in a Provençal church.

They visit the academy at Aps, where Numa, when a child, had the Ignorantin brothers for his schoolmasters. He recalled with a shudder the bucket of brine under the teacher's chair in which the ferules were soaked to make the leather supple; the square of the class where they recited on their knees, and for the least fault dragged themselvs, extending and withdrawing their hands, before the brother Bonte a Cuire, cook as well as flagellator, standing stiff in his rough black robe raised under the arms by the effort of the blow, and the "han!" of this dear brother, and the burning at the end of the little fingers black with ink, like a swarm of stinging ants. And as the brutality of such punishments revolted her, Roumestan spoke of worse, as when they had to lick the floor, the dust of which, become mud, made their palates raw.

"But that is frightful. . . . And you defend those people! . . . You speak for them in the legislativ chamber!"

"Ah, my child . . . that is politics," replied Numa tranquilly.

Catholic schools are often reproached with the superficial character of their instruction. Be this as it may, in the superficialities of literature and science, how profound the moral lessons of humility and obedience which make a politician shudder after the lapse of thirty years! What submissiv subjects the Ignorantin brothers prepare for the state!

. . . . . .

"Ah, a Provencal peasant's house." Roumestan asks, "Hav you still a vineyard here?"

She bounded like a goat stung by an asp, and her voice rose to a fury.

Vineyard? Ah, yes, out of five plots in vines they had preserved only one, and that by keeping it flooded half the year, costing them their very eyes out of their heads. And whose fault is this? The Reds, those hogs, those monsters, and their republic without religion, that has let loose upon the country all the abominations of hell.

And as she spoke, her eyes grew blacker of a murderous black, her pretty face convulsed in a grimace, her mouth twisted, and her eyebrows knotted in midforehead, yet without any interruption in her housekeeping duties, kindling the fire and making coffee. She brandished like a fury the flaming sticks.

This peasant girl is logical in her faith. A supernatural cause and governor of nature being accepted, all effects of climate and season are providential and announce God's contentment or displeasure at the human administration of affairs. The analogy of such a religion with the monarchy in politics is sensible, their autocratic principle being the same; while the pretension of republics to more liberty at the expense of loyalty is impious. Hence the zeal of our Republican statesmen to inscribe God in their Constitution, placing their robberies under his immediate protection. EDGEWORTH.

August 3d Viktor E. Lennstrand made his reappearance upon the lecture platform and delivered on this sacred day of the Christians his two "blasphemous" lectures, "Why I am Opposed to Christianity" and "God," lectures for which he has served altogether nine months' imprisonment.

From La Vérite we gather the following piece of news. V. Badios Puyal, until of late secretary of the Freethought society Monturial in Barcelona and editor of the Liberal journal La Aura del Librepensamento, has been obliged to seek a refuge in France. A heretical article brought upon him the wrath of that class of people especially expected to love their enemies but who do not liv up to the command.

Our friend Captain Otto Thomson has likewise appeared on the platform. July 27th he delivered at Markim in Upland a lecture on "The Foolishness of Prayer." After the lecture a Freethought branch society was formed, and the captain announced he would speak the day following. To an audience of about one hundred and fifty people he began speaking upon "The Christianity of Our Times," but was interrupted by the police officer present, who deemed the subject too "interesting."

A wave of orthodoxy seems to hav stricken the officials of the German empire. From Freirigiöses Sonntags-Blatt we gather the information that in Erfurt the editor of Thüringer Tribüne, K. Aug. Schulze, has been sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment for making public ridicule of the Christian church in a poem which appeared in his journal. Dr. Voelkel, who is, by personal experience, to be considered an authority upon questions of this character, declares he cannot find anything that deserves punishment according to the law. The Reid Case.

The following communications, concerning the above, were received by the editor of the Better Way:

EXECUTIV MANSION, WASHINGTON, D. C.

MR. A. F. MELCHERS, Dear Sir: I am directed by the president to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st inst., in behalf of the pardon of Mr. Walter E. Reid, and to inform you that it has been referred to the attorney-general for attention. Very respectfully, O. L. PRUDEN, Assistant Secretary.

U. S. SENATE, WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 12, 1890.

My Dear Sir: Your favor of late date is at hand. I hav interested myself in behalf of Mr. Reid, but up to the present time without success. The department of justice has recently advised me that for the present, no affirmativ action will be taken in the matter of a pardon, owing to the adverse recommendation from the district-attorney who prosecuted the case. It may be, however, that favorable action will be taken if the application is strongly pressed, notwithstanding.

I inclose you a copy of a letter just received from the department of justice bearing upon this case.

Yours very truly, M. S. QUAY.

[COPY.]

In re-application for pardon of Walter E. Reid.

In the absence of a counter showing, the report of the United States attorney will be considered as disposing of the case.

By direction of the attorney-general.

Very respectfully, E. F. SCHOTT, Clerk of Pardons.

Christian Idolatry.

There is nothing for which a people is so sensitiv, jealous, and tender, as for their idols.

It is no matter what form their idolatry takes, whether it is for external material images, or for the more delicate and ideal form, which is embraced in words and visions, that are supposed to hav a supernatural significance. Attack their idols, and they feel it an irreverence that wounds their feelings, and alienates their friendship. If they hav worshiped an illusion and placed their affections on it as important for their spiritual life, it has all the charm and virtue of a reality.

There is a constant proneness with those raised and trained in thoughts and habits of idolatry to form in the mind images in connection with words used in expressing religious or theological lessons. It is a sad and serious reflection that people who hav had the advantages of an education should so persist in teaching to the young with so much solemnity, this popular and universal faith in Christian idolatry. No purity of life, or excellence of moral character, or degree of intelligence, can shield the opponent of idolatry from the persecution, enmity, and abuse of the idolator.

If heathen idolatry is a lamentable evil and misfortune, ours is equally so; if not in grossness, it is in its insinuating and refined subtleties, by which it takes captiv its victim, and holds his mind and moral nature as completely under its control, as that of the Bushman holds him to his gods.

The missionary assertion and belief, that in order to convert the heathen their confidence and faith in idols must be destroyed, are correct. While the mind and feelings are fixed and dwell on idols of any kind, it is difficult to excite the individual to take much interest in subjects beyond them, and only so far as they can be made auxiliary or to contribute to the support of his idolatry. Whenever religion is made a specialty, a technicality, it becomes idolatry. The heathen has his carved, graven, manufactured, material objects to contemplate and worship, and the Christian his imaginary and ideal ones.

It is said that Moses commanded the Jews thus: "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them."

This would seem broad and general enough to be prohibitory, but the Christian accepts it, and has plenty of room to indulge his imagination left. He finds a wide field for the range of his fancy, without literally violating this command. He knows his physical life cannot be sustained without the support of tangible material objects. He relies wholly on them to supply his physical wants, and feels they are indispensable to his existence.

There is no idolatry in this, for everything is real.

So, in catering to his spiritual wants, his imagination traverses the spiritual realms or the regions of the fanciful, to find his spiritual supplies. He will not make for himself a Baal nor a Dagon, but he has a whole vocabulary of words at his command to deify.

Words that were formed originally simply to convey a thought can easily be used as symbols and representativs of the idolatrous feelings; and we can clothe them with our ideals and bestow upon them our homage. If gifted with a vivid imagination, we hav a much wider field than the heathen, which is confined to visible objects. It is remarkable with what facility and acceptance we avail ourselvs of these privileges.

We hav many holy words, and we can make more, as fast as we want them. When they are made holy they lose their original sense and are no longer exactly definable.

We want them to represent, in some sense, a something that is not found either in heaven or the earth or the waters under the earth; yet be ample for our imaginations to draw on, to support our spiritual life. Every word should be used to convey a distinct, definit, comprehensible thought. If diverted from this and personified into something holy, spiritual, or supernatural, it becomes an idol, or represents an idol, and must not be used or spoken with levity. It must be expressed with becoming solemnity, reverence, and tone, lest we giv offense to the Holy Ghost, our idol, and it should turn and reprove or punish us. Everything the Holy Ghost, or holy spirit, says or does, becomes sacred. Even the words which express his doings lose their common human qualities and become symbols of a divine or holy gravity. Many of these words which the ancients used in their metaphors, parables, and allegories, in order to giv expression to their rational, sensible thoughts, hav been seized by the church, and are held as hostages to do service in the holy work of glorifying and honoring their longings for idols and objects on which to bestow their adoration and homage. And how precious these words, and the visions they represent, hav become to many of us! We invoke the imaginary powers, or spiritual halo, that we fancy ever accompanies them, and lean upon it as our support, as the heathen does on his visible idol.

So long as we hav any idols, no matter how shadowy, or with how much or how little divinity we clothe them, we are only idolators. And they will remain as much an obstacle to our conversion to the truth as the graven images of the heathen are to his. Admit that we are one step beyond or in advance of him, our idols will demand, and receive of us, the same loyalty, and hold us just as firm to our allegiance as his hold him. We never can know the truth while we worship idols. They are our sovereigns, lords, and saviors, and our fealty is due to them.

We hav neither time nor disposition to do anything to divide our affection, alienate our reverence, or lessen our confidence in them and our reliance on them, in the most trying emergencies.

When the "Truth shall make you free" we will hav no idols to serve. We will look beyond words, visions, and ghosts. We will hav no further use for them. The real and the true will become the objects of our affections and researches. Their unfading and deathless charms will ever enchant us. We will then never deceive or wish to be deceived.

No gloss or glory, or shadowy visions of ghosts or ghouls, or fairy visitors from the unseen or unknown will ever beguile or disturb us. Our fealty and devotion to the absolute and true will furnish us ample scope for our faculties, and fields for achievement and conquest. The world needs redeeming from idolatry and error, yet we can do but little for it till we know ourselvs to be free.

That our Christian idolatry is as real, if not as material, as exists among the so-called heathen, is as clear as demonstration and history can make anything. To the honest investigators of this there is not a doubt.

Our Catholic ancestors, both Roman and English, true to the instincts and habits of idolatry inherited from a long succession of centuries of rude, semi-barbarous idol worship, must hav believed they were making a great advance in a higher order, and in what to them was a more spiritual quality of religion and worship, when they adopted the Christian name as a substitute for the heathen name and form of idolatry.

Not a few of the fathers openly maintained when defending the new faith with their heathen opponents that their religion was the same as the old; the difference was only in name, and in the changes of mode and times in which its rites were performed or celebrated.

When it was introduced into England, the inhabitants of that island were divided up into semi-savage hordes, under different chiefs or leaders, who were in almost constant warfare with each other. Christianity made little or no progress for centuries in Britain. It was a very vague faith and but little known till the Bible was translated into the nation's tongue.

It was then that our present form of Christian idolatry took definit shape and proportions.

The Bible was translated in a linguistic style, with personifications, and with an external imagery in its pictures, allegories, and metaphors that brought the text and sentiment down to the level of thought and conception of a crude, uncultured, semi-barbaous population.
